SOVIET RUSSIA is still pressing Foreign Minister Laval of France to conclude a military alliance between these two countries, but Laval holds off, proposing instead the European security pact which would include Russia but would not be drawn up especially for her. Moscow is reported to be greatly vexed and it is said in Paris that French communists have been instructed by the Third Internationale to stir up all the trouble they can in order to coerce the government, reminding it that Russia, whenever it pleases, can disrupt France's defensive preparations and even bring on a civil war. Communists in France are so numerous and so influential that this may be no idle threat.

OUR minister to Canada, Warren Delano Robbins, succumbed to pneumonia in a New York hospital after a week's illness. He was a first cousin of President Roosevelt and had been in the diplomatic service for more than 25 years, being one of the most distinguished of the "career" men. He had served in Latin America, France, Germany and Washington before being sent to Ottawa.

Adolph S. Ochs, veteran owner and publisher of the New York Times, was stricken with cerebral hemorrhage while visiting old friends in Chattanooga, Tenn., and died without regaining consciousness. He was seventy-seven years old and had been in poor health for some time.

Another notable man taken by death was Edwin Arlington Robinson, generally considered the foremost American poet. He won the Pulitzer prize for poetry in 1922, 1926 and 1928.

ANNOUNCEMENT was made by the State department that the United States has accepted in general terms the proposal of Argentina and Chile for co-operative efforts to end the Bolivia-Paraguay war in the Gran Chaco. It was expected Brazil, which had been consulted, would join in the plan. Just what will be done has not been determined.

KANG TEH, emperor of Manchukuo, is the first foreign ruler ever to visit Tokyo, and he has been received with the greatest honors by Emperor Hirohito. The climax was a magnificent state banquet in the imperial palace at which Hirohito presided. Of course Kang Teh is just a puppet emperor, but the Japanese officially considered him the ruler of an independent state.

RENDER TRIBUTE TO "APPLESEED JOHNNY'S" LABOR

He was a gentle lunatic, "Johnny Appleseed." Or perhaps he was a saint. His first appearance in history, where he is now secure of his niche in the saga of American pioneering, is in the year 1800 when he is seen drifting down the Ohio in a strange craft with a queer cargo: two canoes lashed together bearing a load of rotten apples from the cider presses of Pennsylvania. His errand is to plant apple seeds in the wilderness that orchards may be there awaiting the white settlers when they arrive. This was his errand for 46 years. Like a good many other beneficent cranks he is supposed to have been born in Boston, and perhaps the wine of revolution mixed with his blood, for his birth year is given as 1775. Of holy books he had two: the Bible and Emmanuel Swedenborg, which he read aloud to border families by the light of cabin fires; he ate no meat, killed no living creatures—not even venomous reptiles—befriended animals, went unharmed, though all but naked, in a savage wilderness that teemed with wild beasts and Indians, and these last venerated him as a powerful "medicine." In 1812 he spread the alarm of an impending Indian attack and saved hundreds of settlers from massacre. But more than saint, he was artist, and his art-form was the apple. It was a passionate conviction with him that the tree should be raised from the seed, and he chose his orchard sites for fertility and picturesqueness with the fastidious taste of poet and painter, fenced the enclosure, and returned each year to tend his trees. Ohio people still remember him with affection for his were the first fruits of their wilderness.—Boston Globe.

German Athleticism

Before long all German students of both sexes will have to take a course of sports and gymnastics for the first three terms of their academic careers. The obligatory course will comprise gymnastics, athletics, boxing, swimming and shooting, and there will be inter-school and inter-university championships. After one year students will be examined for a sports diploma. Unsuccessful candidates will not be allowed to begin their fourth term.

SPEED counts—whether your flight is on skis, on the new streamline trains, or whether it's mental speed. But in order that your haste shall not make waste, see that your family meals have plenty of energy foods to repair the tissues which are used up in your hurry.

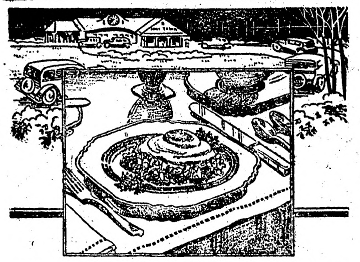
It doesn't need to be a meal that costs a lot. Here is a dinner that will take a family of four a long ways. It costs a dollar.

Baked Pork Chops with Relish 35¢
Baked Carrots and Peas 16¢
Apple Sauce Relish 13¢
Corn Sticks 12¢
Baked Custard 17¢
Coffee 7¢

Baked Carrots and Peas: Slice or dice two carrots and place in buttered dish with one-fourth teaspoon salt and a few grains of pepper. Add one-half cup liquor from one No. 1 can of peas. Cover and bake one hour in a moderate oven—375 degrees. Fifteen minutes before removing from the oven, add the drained peas from the No. 1 can. Add two tablespoons butter just before serving. This is also a delicious luncheon dish.

Apple Sauce Relish: Mix one cup of canned apple sauce and three tablespoons horseradish. Chill. Just before serving fold in one-third cup of cream which has been whipped. Serve as a relish with the pork chops.*

Better Breakfasts



YOU don't have to wait till you're forty to begin life. You can begin it at 6:40 or 7:40 any fine morning if your breakfast is the sort that makes a new man of you. Toast and coffee won't do the trick. It may tide you over, but for getting out and doing things you'll need food that gives energy and inspiration.

Try this breakfast that starts off with a different fruit cup, features corned beef hash with a crisp crust on top that supports a fluffy poached egg, and then proceeds with English muffins toasted golden brown enough to suit an Englishman, and served with a tart home-made plum jam. And of course coffee—vacuum packed and steaming hot:

Bananas in Pineapple Juice
Corned Beef Hash with Poached Eggs
Toasted English Muffins
Plum Jam Coffee

Bananas in Pineapple Juice: Slice four large bananas into eight dessert glasses. Pour over the contents of one No. 2 can of pineapple juice and three tablespoons maraschino cherry syrup which have been chilled together overnight. Sprinkle with a little chopped fresh mint. This serves eight persons.*

Safetygrams

BY FRED W. BRAUN
The Safety Man

Laws are not the cure for the prevention of automobile accidents. Laws are made to regulate traffic that is daily using our highways. Investigation discloses that a very small percentage of the fatal accidents in the United States is chargeable to criminally reckless drivers. By far the greater number of accidents resulted from the common faults of the average motorist. If people would drive motor vehicles according to the existing traffic regulations, most of the accidents would be elimated.

An arterial sign that reads "STOP" means just what it reads. It does not mean to slow up, to sneak across, but it means to bring the car to a dead stop before proceeding.

It takes courage to know and recognize your own driving mistakes. It is commendable on your part to acknowledge them and correct them.

Increase In Farms Shown

An increase of fourteen and a half per cent in the number of farms in the Ninth congressional district in the five-year period from 1930 to 1935 is indicated in the final report of C. W. Bouvette, supervisor of the agricultural census for the district.

The increase is believed to be largely due to the arrival of many families from the drouth stricken districts of the Dakotas and elsewhere, and in locating here the great majority of them have chosen the eastern counties of the district, where fuel is plentiful, land is cheap and the water supply above normal average.

Evere county in the district shows a substantial increase ranging from around six per cent in Norman, Clay and Wilkin to twenty-nine per cent in Clearwater, twenty in Roseau and eighteen in Beltrami.

This does not mean new farms to any great extent. While a few new places have been opened, the great bulk of the increase has come through occupation of farms that were idle in 1930. As a result there are now very few idle and abandoned farms left in the district. The new pleces opened are generally small, consisting of a few acres and usually located close to the larger towns, and a number along the lakes and rivers.

The total number of the farms in the district in 1930 was 31,633 and the enumerators this year found 36,296.

The figures for 1935 and 1930 by counties are as follows:

	1935	1930
Becker	3,557	2,737
Beltrami	2,463	2,083
Clay	2,227	2,087
Clearwater	1,935	1,500
Kittson	1,483	1,344
Lake of the Woods	1,029	723
Mahnomen	844	681
Marshall	2,988	2,508
Norman	2,074	1,946
Ottertail	7,333	6,708
Pennington	1,304	1,100
Polk	4,798	4,205
Red Lake	986	891
Roseau	2,306	1,922
Wilkin	1,279	1,198

The increase in each county by percentage is as follows: Becker 12.3, Beltrami 17.7, Clay 6.6, Clearwater 29, Kittson 10.7, Lake of the Woods 42.3, Mahnomen 23, Marshall 19.1, Norman 6.3, Ottertail 9.3, Pennington 18.5, Polk 14, Red Lake 10.6, Roseau 19.9, Wilkin 6.6.

Part of the increase in Lake of the Woods county is due to the omission of figures from one township in the 1930 census and the actual gain there is about 30 per cent.

Governor's Proclamation

It is fitting that the return of spring should turn our thoughts to the problem of preserving and improving the abundant natural resources of our State. In view of the catastrophic efforts of the drought and the ensuing misery, we cannot remain indifferent to the nation-wide conservation movement. It is important that we understadd and support the work that is being done in Minnesota toward adequate water and erosion control.

The very existence of the state as a leading agricultural region has been threatened by the cumulative effect of decades of exploitation. If we do not lend our support to the conservation work being carried on by the federal and state government, we are placing in jeopardy our most precious possession, the land on which we live and depend. The nation has finally awakened to the need of replanting our denuded forest lands, of preventing soil erosion, and of maintaining our water supply.

The federal government has taken the lead in fostering this movement and by so doing has given employment to thousands of our youth. It is essential for our welfare and for the welfare of future generations that we continue to cooperate in this great work.

In order to further an understanding of the need and significance of conservation work, it is proper that one week of the year be set aside for the purpose of impressing upon our citizenry the far reaching benefits that a planned program of conservation will insure. Thousands of our citizens have been given hope and encouragement through the employment opportunities afforded by conservation work.

Now, Therefore, I, Floyd B. Olson, Governor of Minnesota, do hereby designate May 5th to May 11th as MINNESOTA CONSERVATION WEEK and Friday, May, 3rd, as ARBOR AND BIRD DAY

I urge that schools, churches, and civic groups observe this week and this day with ceremonies approiate to the occasion.

In Witness Whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the Great Seal of the State of Minnesota to be affixed this 23rd day of April, 1935.

Floyd B. Olson
Governor of Minnesota.

Change Seven U. S. Routes

Route numbers of seven U. S. highways in Minnesota will be changed by the state highway department the latter part of this week to conform to a revision of U. S. routes recently announced at Washington. Several state trunks also are affected. The new numbers are shown on the 1935 state highway maps, just issued.

Following are the changes.

U. S. 59 replaces Minnesota Trunk Highway 73 from Pembina on the north to the Iowa line on the south.

U. S. 10 enters Minnesota at Prescott, Wis., instead of at Hudson, and follows U. S. 61 to its present junction with U. S. 10 in St. Paul. U. S. 10 replaces Trunk Highway No. 94 between Prescott and U. S. 61.

U. S. 63 replaces U. S. 59 from Iowa line through Rochester to Lake City, follows U. S. 61 to Red Wing and replaces T. H. 58 from Red Wing to Wisc., line.

Trunk Highway 73 replaces T. H. 63 from Moose Lake to Gheen.

U. S. 65 from the south ends in Minneapolis. From Minneapolis north it becomes Minnesota Trunk Highway 65.

U. S. 69 replaces T. H. 13 between Albert Lea and the Iowa line.

Trunk Highway 94 replaces T. H. 69 in and west of Duluth.

U. S. 212 from the west ends in St. Paul. From St. Paul to Stillwater it becomes T. H. 212.

U. S. 218 from the south ends at Owatonna. From Owatonna north to Brainerd it becomes T. H. 218.

The Weather

The weather the past week has been rather cool. We have had sunshine but the cold wind has kept the mercury from climbing very high. Frost was reported from many parts of the state.

Times are not so bad any more. One farmer reports that he got $96 for a cow he shipped to So. St. Paul.

Government Wheat Program

Wheat growers of Marshall county and the entire country will determin for themselves whether they wish to continue the Government Allotment program at a special referendum which will take place in all community divisions on May, 25, according to R. A. Reierson, county extension agent, who attended a conference at University Farm, St. Paul, Monday, where the referendum plan was discussed.

Mr. Reierson was accompanied to the St. Paul conference by Carl A. Johnson and Carl Olson, members of the Marshall county allotment committee. M. L. Wilson, of Montana, author of the allotment plan, who is assistant U. S. Secretary of Agriculture, outlined the proposals which will be brought before the referendum on May, 25.

A series of educational meetings will be conducted throughout the county prior to May 25, the county agent pointed out. All community committees will be called to attend a meeting on May 6th, at 8 p. m. in the Court Room at Warren, at which the entire proposed program will be outlined. A specialist from the University Farm School, will attend this meeting. Local meetings will then be held in the various communities of the county.

Young Woman Called Home

Mrs. Arthur Knutson who has been ill the past year, passed away early Tuesday morning at the Oakland Park Sanitarium at Thief River Falls. Funeral services will be conducted from the Free Mission Church at Holt on Saturday afternoon.

Moved Up From Chicago

Herb Severson and family who have been living in Chicago the past few years moved to Thief River Falls this week.

Mr. Severson will open an auto repair shop there.

CURRENT EVENTS PASS IN REVIEW

THREE POWERS IN A UNITED FRONT AGAINST GERMANY; BOOM FOR McCARL.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© Western Newspaper Union.

SIX of Europe's foremost statesmen, with experts and secretaries, solemnly considered peace plans and security pacts on Isola Bella, a lovely little island in Lake Maggiore off Stresa, Italy. The conference was momentous, but it was of an "exploratory" nature, and no definite results were expected. Prime Minister Ramsay MacDonald and Foreign Secretary Sir John Simon, representing Great Britain, were willing to carry out that nation's military obligations under the Locarno treaty but balked at further commitment in continental affairs. Anyhow, they had promised to enter into no new agreements without the consent of parliament, which cannot be consulted until after the Easter holidays. Premier Flandin and Foreign Minister Laval of France sought to persuade England to line up with France and Russia rather than with Germany, and they presented as one argument a new mutual assistance pact they had just signed with Russia. Premier Mussolini, solemn and pessimistic, handled matters for Italy with the help of Fulvio Suvich, undersecretary of foreign affairs. He had already warned the world that the issue of war or peace probably could not be settled at Stresa.

Premier Flandin

Of course, the chief question was the attitude of other nations toward the constantly growing Pan-Germanism of the reich under Hitler, and the first concrete problem taken up was France's appeal to the League of Nations against Germany's repudiation of the military clauses of the Versailles treaty.

Premiers Mussolini and Mac Donald persuaded Flandin to moderate the tone of this protest and not to demand any specific penalty against Germany, and then all approved the note and in a resolution slapped Hitler on the wrist for halting the progress toward arms limitation.

The three premiers also agreed that their nations should act in concert in promoting an Eastern Locarno, strengthening the position of Austria, Hungary and Bulgaria, proceeding with the negotiation of an air convention, opposing unilateral repudiation of treaties, and calling a Danubian conference in May.

France's memorandum as submitted to the League of Nations council when it assembled in Geneva was still a vigorously worded document, characterizing Hitler's military moves as "the culmination of long and methodical labors pursued in secret." The action, it said, "has deliberately destroyed one of the bases" of Germany's collaboration with the league. "By so doing it has seriously compromised the success of international negotiations on limitation of armaments pursued under the auspices of the League of Nations and on the basis of article VIII of the league covenant," the memorandum continued.

Foreign Minister Laval, who presented the memorandum, recommended that Germany be "condemned" for her action, and that the league consider economic penalties against nations which, in the future, violate treaties.

Berlin came back at the memorandum with an official communique which said:

"If France believes it is necessary to recall the obligations forced on Germany one need only to recall France's solemn and voluntary obligations in the Locarno protocol to take immediate steps toward disarmament.

"The statements of the French ministers for years revealed that France never seriously intended to carry out the disarmament obligations."

Actually, the Stresa conference resulted in little more than a demonstration of the continued solidarity of the three great powers participating. This was in a considerable measure a triumph for Mussolini, who had expected nothing more, but had insisted on the united front.

THE new mutual assistance agreement reached by France and Russia was at first supposed to be merely an agreement on sanctions to be taken against an aggressor once the latter has been determined by the League of Nations. But Paris correspondents assert that it is in effect a military alliance such as Russia had been urging on France and that in certain cases the signatories will determine for themselves who is the aggressor without waiting for word from Geneva. The agreement is, of course, directed primarily against Germany.

That Russia still seeks "to maintain and strengthen the general peace" was shown by the signing of a Russo-German trade treaty which it is believed will greatly increase the volume of Russia's orders in the reich.

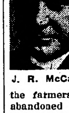
THERE will be no strike at present in the tire plants of Akron, for the rubber workers in the Goodyear, Goodrich and Firestone factories ratified an agreement that was reached in Washington between labor leaders and officials of the three companies brought together by Secretary of Labor Perkins. The pact provides that the companies will meet with representatives of any group of employees for collective bargaining. It also postpones strike action pending final court tests of orders by the national labor board that Goodyear and Firestone should hold immediate elections for representation in collective bargaining.

JUST as soon as the President says the word, the federal bureau of public roads and the various state highway departments are ready to jump into the work of grade crossing elimination, the building of arterial highways and similar projects. The work relief act earmarks $800,000,000 for such undertakings, and the sum may be increased by the President to a billion. The roads bureau already has $100,000,000 of grade crossing eliminations and other projects contracted for under authority granted by congress last year, officials revealed, and these contracts are to be met with work-relief money.

Arthur W. Brandt, president of the American Association of State Highway Officials, advised a congressional committee recently that states were prepared to wipe out 4,058 dangerous crossings if as much as $461,881,500 was made available. He said $277,567,500 of such projects could be completed in a year. Brandt reported also that state officials were ready to begin construction—or widening and straightening—of 1,739 trunk line routes through cities at a cost of $208,732,800.

States will not be required to match the work-relief money set aside for highway, street and crossing construction. After it is made available by the President, the fund will be apportioned among the states.

JOHN R. McCARL, the able, efficient and independent comptroller general of the United States, has annoyed the New Dealers on several occasions. Now he threatens to block the plans of the AAA for lifting the restrictions on spring wheat planting and at the same time continuing to pay the farmers for crop reductions that would not be called for. Declaring they wished to avoid shortages due to the dust storms, the officials of the AAA said the farmers would be paid for the abandoned reductions in acreage if they would promise to curtail their plantings next year. Mr. McCarl asked for further information on this matter and indicated he could not approve of the plan, though AAA men declared he had not ruled definitely against it. Chester C. Davis, AAA administrator, might not be content to abide by such a ruling if it were made, and the administration might refuse to accept it.



J. R. McCarl

Mr. McCarl, a Republican, holds his office under a law which specifies that the comptroller general shall be appointed to a 15-year term and can be removed only by death or impeachment. Nevertheless Attorney General Cummings, it is understood, gave it as his opinion that, like any other Presidential appointee, he could be removed at the pleasure of the President. He based this opinion on a ruling of the Supreme court in the case of a postmaster who was ousted by President Coolidge, the court holding that the President was within his rights under Article 2 of the Constitution. So it may be the New Dealers will seek to have Mr. McCarl ousted before his term expires in 1936, for it is feared by them that he will hamper the expenditure of the $4,880,000,000 work relief appropriation to an extent that would greatly irk the Democratic party leaders.

It is interesting to read that the Nebraska Progressive league, made up of liberal Republicans, is planning the organization of "McCarl for President" clubs in that state and afterward in all others. George W. Kline, its chairman, says he was asked to support McCarl for President in 1936 by friends of Senator George W. Norris. The comptroller general is a graduate of the University of Nebraska law school and for years was Mr. Norris' secretary.

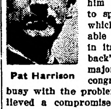
SEVEN agencies of the government are organizing to combat the damage done by the constantly recurring dust storms. They are the AAA, farm credit administration, emergency relief administration, soil erosion service, bureau of plant industry and bureau of agricultural engineering.

The efforts, officials said, will include shipping feed, food and water into the stricken areas of Texas, Oklahoma, New Mexico, Kansas and Colorado, starting work relief projects on roads, private lands and the public domain, planting of fast-growing and hardy crops as ground cover in areas where moisture conditions permit, and "listing" operations. This latter work is an attempt to prevent soil blowing away, by making alternate ridges and furrows.

Meanwhile other officials of the same bureaus were beginning to map out permanent plans designed, they said, to prevent recurrence of dust storms in dry periods.

Primary among these was a program with the declared aim of permanently acquiring, through the AAA and relief administration, 15,000,000 acres of land before July 1. Such land will be retired from farm production to cover crops and forests and for use as recreation and wild-life areas. The land is classed as submarginal by government experts since it is in a region of small annual rainfall.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT called Senator Pat Harrison of Mississippi to the White House for a conference concerning the veterans' bonus bill, which already has passed the house. Harrison is chairman of the senate finance committee and the administration looked to him to devise a way to spike the measure which is so objectionable to the President in its present "greenback" form. Other majority leaders in congress also were busy with the problem, and it was believed a compromise had been found that would solve it. This would be a bill providing full cash payment by 1938 and, meantime, substitution of interest bearing negotiable bonds for the adjusted service certificates due in 1945.



Pat Harrison

Senator Harrison refused to discuss in detail his conversation with Mr. Roosevelt but expressed hope and confidence that within the next few weeks there would be a settlement of the bonus question satisfactory to all.

ACCUSING the federal government in Washington of maintaining a "dictatorial colonial policy," the legislators of Puerto Rico went on strike, walking out of the capitol at San Juan 36 hours before the session would automatically have ended and leaving unfinished a lot of important legislation. The lawmakers complained especially of methods of carrying on relief and rehabilitation on the island.

ANNOUNCEMENT was made by the government that it had uncovered extensive frauds in the immigration and naturalization service from 1928 to 1933, and steps were taken for the ousting of a number of employees and for criminal prosecutions. It was estimated that a ring of bribe takers and fixers had received as much as a million dollars from persons illegally entering the country.

IN HIS first post-vacation conference with congressional leaders, President Roosevelt disregarded their fears of a prolonged session and insisted on enactment of his legislative program. Especially he wants legislation dealing with extension of the NRA, social security, utilities holding companies, extension of federal authority over banking, ship subsidy readjustment and extension of $416,000,000 in nuisance taxes.

Later the President conferred with Senator Joe Robinson, who said both of them felt that very satisfactory progress is being made. To the correspondent Mr. Roosevelt said he hoped to have the work relief program at its peak by the middle of November, at which time 3,500,000 unemployed should be at work under its terms. He indicated this program would be carried out as far as possible by existing governmental agencies. He will seek to avoid moving workers from one area to another, and will take care of as many "white collar" workers as possible.

The social security bill finally was produced on the floor of the house of representatives. There were several blocs against it in its form as reported. These included representatives who want higher unemployment and old age payments; members from the poorer states, who want the federal government to bear the entire cost of the program, with the states relieved of any contribution, and the conservatives, who are opposed to the "government going into the insurance business" and exacting a pay roll tax during the depression.

SIR OSWALD MOSLEY, chief of the British Fascists, has committed his organization to a policy of anti-semitism fully as severe as that of the Hitler Nazis. At a riotous meeting of his Black Shirts in Leicester, Mosley said: "For the first time I openly and publicly challenge Jewish interests in this country. Commanding commerce, commanding the press, commanding the cinema, dominating the city of London, they are killing industry with their sweatshops. These great interests are not intimidating and will not intimidate the Fascist movement of the modern age."

Sir Oswald Mosley

Leaders of more than 200 of Chicago's 300 Jewish organizations assembled to indorse the campaign of the American Jewish congress for consolidation of all organized Jewish action. The chief speaker was the famous Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, national president and founder of the congress. In the course of his address he said:

"I want the day to come when no Jew shall live in Germany—not one. I want the day to come—although I shall not live to see it—when the Jew will be a regretted memory in Germany, just as their presence was a blessing and an ennoblement in every sense."

WILEY POST is having nothing but bad luck in his attempts to fly across the continent in the stratosphere in record-breaking time. On his third try, starting from Burbank, Calif., he got as far as Lafayette, Ind., there his supercharger went wrong. So the famous Winnie Mae came down at Purdue university airport eight hours twelve and one-half minutes after it left the west coast. Post was uncertain of his plans for the future.

With the Minnesota Lawmakers

The Minnesota Legislature began its final week with the huge omnibus bill yet to be ironed out and passed. It is the most important bit of legislation left after the hard grind of the past 80 days. Governor Olson is opposed to many items in the bill and hours of debate indicate there will be some middle ground on which both the houses and the governor can agree.

Governor Olson signed the new automobile license rate bill designed to increase highway department funds approximately $300,000 a year. The law, requiring motorists to obtain new licenses by May 1, fixes a 2.2 per cent rate based on factory prices for all cars above the minimum class of $5 for light cars and $7.50 for heavy. New depreciation rates are 15 per cent after the second year instead of the old 10 per cent annual depreciation. Secretary of State Mike Holm, who issues automobile licenses, said that most car owners have yet to apply for their licenses. He pointed out that the anticipated rush for licenses will necessitate a 25 per cent increase in his staff.

The legislature took the first step toward the establishment of an old age pension system in Minnesota when the house passed the pension bill without a disenting vote. The bill goes to the senate, where previous attempts had been made to incorporate pension provisions in the omnibus tax bill, without success. Under the terms of the bill passed in the house maximum payments would be $45 a month to all persons over 65 years of age. The pension is expected to require appropriations of $5,000,000 for the next biennium and the cost would be borne two-thirds by the state and one-third by the county. The bill was introduced by Representative H. H. Barker of Elbow Lake, an administrative spokesman, and went through the house almost as drawn, with only a few minor amendments.

Reversing the practice termed unconstitutional by the state Supreme Court, of allowing settlements of delinquent taxes at a discount, the house passed a bill to encourage prompt payment of real estate taxes, allowing a 2 per cent discount for payment before the due date. To ease the financial situation of the state, two bills were passed. One increases the limit on state certificates issued in anticipation of tax receipts from $6,000,000 to $9,000,000, with an appropriation of $100,000 to cover interest. The other increases the amount which may be borrowed from other funds to help the revenue fund, from $3,000,000 to $6,000,000.

Other bills passed at a busy house session included a 10 per cent tax on receipt of wrestling bouts, for the benefit of the tuberculosis fund; a two-year extension of the moratorium on rural credit interest payments, and amendment of the inheritance tax law to apply the tax to property held jointly.

Seven of the 13 bills on the state crime commission's legislative program to check criminal activities in Minnesota have been enacted into law. Governor Olson signed four more of the bills, the entire lot of which will cost not more than $130,000 per year. The new measures signed by the governor will establish a state police radio station, attempt to curb bail jumping by making the act a gross misdemeanor, enlarge the state crime bureau from 12 to 28

Gov. Olson has the task of appointing two new members of the state board of education, following action of the senate in refusing to confirm the appointments of Miss Florence Rood, St. Paul, and Mrs. Marion Le Sueur, Minneapolis, who have been serving about a year.

"Why not create a school for legislators? I think we need it more than the policemen do." This suggestion for a new kind of professional training was urged on the floor of the house by Representative C. G. Mann, Hinckley, during the discussion over the establishment of a police training school at the University of Minnesota which was finally approved.

A state appropriation of $500,000 annually to match federal appropriations for mothers' pension funds was approved by the house. The bill, authored by Representative Hannah Kempfer of Erhard, would provide for a fund of $1,500,000, one-third to be paid by the counties which now are paying approximately $1,272,586 annually.

Employees in institutions under the board of control will get increases of $5 to $10 a month by a bill hurried through the legislature and signed by the Governor. Some of these employees get as little as $30 a month, plus maintenance.

Governor Olson vetoed legislation designed to place the village of Chisholm school district on a cash basis plan, declaring that he objected to Representative Charles Wangenstein's bill on the same grounds as he presented in his veto of the so-called North Hibbing bills.

The bill withdrawing the state of Minnesota from a $60,000,000 venture into the field of rural land financing proceeded to the senate after the house, by a vote of 100 to 8, approved the liquidation program for the rural credits bureau. Designed both to get the state out of the land owning business and to return the land to the tax rolls, the legislation adopted by the house after substantial amendments would authorize the rural credits conservator to scale down loans to a reasonable market value and then attempt to sell back farms to original owners at an interest rate of 3 per cent. This later provision caused a lengthy debate with the original proposal calling for 4 per cent and with some representatives favoring a 4½ per cent rate. The former owners could contract to pay for the land either in crops or in cash. County appraisal boards of three members, once each named by the conservator, the mortgagee and the court, would fix the market value of the land. Appeals could be made to the court of jurisdiction.

All marathons, walkathons and other endurance contests are prohibited in Minnesota under a house bill passed by the senate, and now sent to the Governor.

The house killed the statutory tax limitation measure for local municipalities after short debate. Although the bill once was regarded as an important part of the program to relieve the tax rate on property, it ran into stiff opposition from representatives who saw its limitation provisions as an encroachment on home rule. The bill would have limited the general tax levy on property by local government to the average levy for the past five years. It would apply for the next three tax years.

The senate passed an administration bill to permit extension of municiaplly owned power and light lines 30 miles beyond the boundaries of the municipality. The vote was 48 to 3 for the bill, under which the existing law, limiting such extensions to 25 miles, was broadened to boost the limit to 30 miles. Only one other change was made in the present act. Now a four-fifths vote of the governing body is required before any such extensions can be made.

Establishment of a state system of livestock weighing and grading with licensing and bonding of buyers was approved by the legislature, with the passage by the house of the measure as amended by the senate. The bill as it goes to Governor Olson for signature is statewide in its effect, the amendments of the original draft making it apply to the South St. Paul market as well as concentration points in other sections. Commission firms would be licensed and would be required to furnish a $2,000 bond. The measure applies to points at which the daily sale and purchase of livestock is 250 or more head.

Legislators approved additional physical weapons for warfare against organized crime, when the house voted to increase the state highway patrol to 100 men and gave them full police powers on the highway despite the vehement objection of labor members. The senate bill, which was amended to increase the highway patrol from 70 to 100 members, weathered the onslaught of spokesmen of labor who declared it would create a state police force, and was passed by a vote of 86 to 30.

A collection of 26 bills, including the $9,000,000 state board of control appropriation and a third public emergency measure, were made into law by Governor Olson's signature. The governor, cleaning up a new accumulation of legislative products, approved the big board of control law which provides approximately $7,500,000 for its various institutions. He also signed the bill for suspending cancellations of leases on real property. The later measure provides that cancellation for default on 20-year leases, or on leases of longer terms, is insufficient cause. The new law, to be effective until March 1, 1937, follows the extension of the mortgage moratorium and the cancellation of contracts for deed measure. A lesee has access to the courts, provided he follows specified procedure, to thwart cancellations because of alleged default. The law provides that he must reply with written objections within 15 days from the time notice of cancellation is filed.

Governor Olson is seeking a special $125,000 annual appropriation from the legislature to be used as the state's share in carrying on an enlarged federal CCC program in Minnesota. So advising Representative J. R. Sweitzer, chairman of the house appropriations committee, Governor Olson informed him that the government plans to double CCC activities in the state. Already, he said, the plan has reached the point where it has been decided shortly to increase Minnesota's camps to 64, as compared with 41 of last year. This, he said, will provide for a heavy increase over the 10,000 CCC recruits of a year ago.

Demanding union wages, which had not been granted, eight powerhouse employes walked out at the capitol. Lights went dim, then out. The temperature in the buildings dropped, and the legislators along with the employes of government began to be chilled. The house of representatives quit work; elevators stopped running, and office workers resorted to candles. Then the governor summoned five representatives of the strikers for a conference with himself, reached a satisfactory wage decision, and the men went to work.

SYNOPSIS

Theodore Gatlin adopts a baby, "Penelope," in an effort to solve his matrimonial troubles. But his wife has never wanted her, and their affairs end in the divorce court. At a baseball game a ball strikes ten-year-old Penelope on the nose. Mrs. Gatlin spirits the child to Europe. Gatlin wills Penelope all his money, and is about to begin a search for her when a motor accident ends his life. Some ten years later, in San Francisco, Stephen Burt, rising young psychiatrist, is presented by Dan McNamara, chief of police, with a new patient—Nance Belden, a girl with a dual personality, for which her "saddle nose" is in part responsible. McNamara does not think she is a criminal and obtains Burt's testimony in court. Lanny, the doctor's office nurse, is also won over. Nance's criminal record outweighs Doctor Burt's explanation of her case and she is sent to San Quentin penitentiary. Nance escapes, although shot, and goes to Lanny's apartment, from which, by McNamara's orders, she is removed to the chief's home. From one of the men in the boat on which the girl escaped McNamara learns that Nance's real name is Penelope Gatlin. He also discovers that she is heiress to $750,000.

Angelloti was a resourceful fellow. "Let's call on that Lanning woman, apologize for our rough work last night, an' maybe she'll slip us some o' that pre-war Bourbon again."

Flynn nodded, and they drove to Lanny's house. Lanny received them coldly. "Have you come to search my house again?" she demanded irritably.

No mule's face could possibly have been longer and sadder than P. Flynn's. "We didn't come to annoy you, Miss Lanning. The chief's give us the inside story. We just called to apologize for even suspectin' you."

"An officer," Angelloti explained, "has got to do a lot o' things he don't like to do in the discharge of his duty. The apology goes double, Miss Lanning."

"It's accepted." Then they shook hands. "How about a shot in the arm?" Lanny, the worldling, suggested, much mollified.

Angelloti shrugged expressively. "Well, seein' as how," P. Flynn murmured. So they had three drinks and spent a very pleasant evening with Lanny and she was loath to see them depart.

Now, Lanny was aware that Stephen had planned to visit his queer patients after dinner that night. So she telephoned—and Dan McNamara answered.

"I shouldn't ring you up this late and get you out of bed—"

"Not at all. Just got in this minute."

"I'm glad. How's everything, Dan?"

"I haven't seen the patients, but my chief of staff was up waiting for me, and reports everything jake."

"That's all I wanted to know. Thanks, Dan. Oh, by the way, Flynn and Angelloti called on me again, tonight."

"What's that!" The chief's voice was a roar. "What are those two eggs up to? I told them to lay off you."

"They're doing that, Dan. They just called to apologize. They spent the evening with me. They only left a moment ago."

"The liquor must have run out."

"Oh, Dan!"

"I know those two. It would never occur to them to apologize to anybody if they didn't have a reason. It's just as I suspected, Lanny. They're going to hang on to this case on the quiet and trail you around."

An anguished thought popped into Lanny's agile brain. "Oh, Dan, suppose they took a notion to trail Stevie!"

"Hush! You don't have to paint me any picture, Lanny. When did these two busybodies call at your house?"

"At nine-fifteen."

"Wait a minute." Lanny waited a minute and then McNamara said: "Stephen left here just about that time, so I guess we're safe tonight. And tomorrow I'll cover that loophole. I'm an ass not to have thought of it before. Good night."

In the morning Dan McNamara sent for Flynn and informed him he was to depart that night for Los Angeles to bring back a prisoner. Flynn begged Angelloti to keep his eyes on the job. But that night McNamara found other work for Angelloti. By the time Flynn returned, Angelloti was gone, and the same night, without a moment's notice, McNamara shot him up to Seattle on a similar job.

He let himself into the house that night with his latchkey, turned on the hall light and whistled. "Hello, everybody," he shouted. Nobody answered, so he hurried down to Nance's room. The door was open. He switched on the light and found a disordered bed with nobody in it. He searched the house thoroughly, only to discover he was alone in it; finally, on the living room table he found a note:

"Dear Chief: We think you mean well and we thank you for what you have done, but the dicks are watching this house. They trailed the doctor last night, but a friend of ours trailed them. Forgive us if we just can't trust any cop. Anyhow, it would be embarrassing for you if your men found us here. Good-by and good luck."

McNamara sat down. He was suddenly weak. So he hadn't fooled Flynn and Angelloti after all. The smart devils! Well, they might suspect all they pleased, but unless they had seen his guests and recognized Nance they could never prove anything.

He realized now that his act in sending them out of the state would clinch their suspicions; they would be sure to have somebody in their confidence keep the house under constant surveillance until they got back. Evidently they had sent a bungler and the ex-soldier had spotted the fellow—he wondered if Nance and her loyal friends had made a clean getaway.

The front doorbell rang and he went to answer it. A thin, bent man stood in the entrance, and even in the dim light from the hall McNamara knew him for an ex-convict in his prison suit of civilian clothes.

"Chief McNamara?" he queried huskily.

"Yes, I'm the chief."

"I got out of San Quentin this morning. I had a message for you, but I didn't want to come to headquarters to deliver it. Benny the Beetle told me to tell you to rest easy."

"Thanks, friend. Come in and rest easy yourself. Let's get acquainted," McNamara invited hospitably. In the clearer light of the living room he saw his visitor was far from being a well man. "What is it, kid?" he demanded. "Hop—or T. B.?"

"The old coughin' sickness, Chief. The prison directors shortened my term to let me out for treatment. As if I can get treatment anywhere," he added bitterly.

"Oh, yes, you can. I'm living alone here for the next thirty days, so I'll get a nurse in to take care of you, and you stay here."

The man looked at him suspiciously. "You mean it, Chief?"

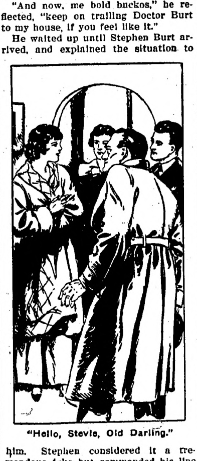
"What did Benny tell you about me?" McNamara asked.

"He told me to trust you. He said you was one human being, even if you was a chief of police."

He changed the linen on Nance's bed, put the room in order, laid out a suit of pajamas and ordered his guest to bed.

"And now, me bold buckos," he reflected, "keep on trailing Doctor Burt to my house, if you feel like it."

He waited up until Stephen Burt arrived, and explained the situation to him. Stephen considered it a tremendous joke but commended his line of attack on Flynn and Angelloti.



"Hello, Stevie, Old Darling."

"The man does need treatment very badly," he told the chief. "I'll send around a practical nurse early tomorrow morning to look after him, and I'll continue to call upon the poor devil nightly until further orders. We're both involved in a tricky game now and must play the hand through."

Doctor Burt was suddenly serious. "I do hope we haven't lost Nance, Dan. She's the most interesting psychological case I've ever seen."

"She ain't lost, but I'll bet a cookie she's well hid. But I'll locate her within twelve hours," Chief McNamara added, thinking of Ella Cates.

"I've run Nance's early history down since I saw her last, Doc," he announced suddenly. "I got busy the other day and luck was with me. She's an heiress and her name is Penelope Gatlin. She got it in the nose by a baseball—a long fly into the bleachers. But I also discovered something else. It's a question whether she ain't just a natural nut. Her mother is. She led Gatlin a h—l of a life."

"No, I don't think it's congenital, Dan. There's something about that girl that's healthy—mentally and physically. Did you meet her mother?"

"No, but I'm going to run her down easy enough."

Stephen sighed. "Oh, poor Nance! I'm afraid she's beyond my skill, after all. A bad family history, Mac—very bad. There's a structural weakness in some families that never gets bred out, and I suspect poor Nance has an inheritance of mental instability from her mother."

"Well, with that busted nose, her inheritance and her hellcat mother, she certainly had a fine start on the road to the foolish farm, didn't she, Doc? Excuse me, there's the telephone."

Lanny was calling. "Dan," she quavered, "my house has been burglarized. They jimmied the back door, and for all I know the burglars are upstairs still. I'm watching the staircase—got my pistol covering it. Come over quick, Dan—please."

"Coming right away, Lanny." He hung up and faced Stephen. "Lanny has burglars. Into your car, boy, and we'll beat it over."

CHAPTER VII

Lanny, very white and shaken, was in her living room, pistol in hand, watching the stairs, when McNamara and Stephen came noiselessly in the back door. The chief whipped out his pistol and went unhesitatingly up the stairs. Presently he called them to come up.

They found him standing in the doorway leading into Lanny's guest chamber. "Take a look at that," he ordered.

They looked. Lying in the bed, sound asleep, was Nance Belden!

McNamara switched off the light and softly closed the door. With his great head clasped in both huge hands he went down the stairs to the living room. "Doc," he pleaded, "whose loony now? I think I am because I'm seeing things that ain't in the book. Ochone, ochone, and wirra, wirra, the fairies have me in tow!"

"Got to get her out of here," Dan McNamara decided. "Flynn and Angelloti finally got on her trail, no doubt about that—and it's a mighty cold trail those two dicks can't follow. I suspected this, and the note she left at my house confirms it. It's just the mercy of God that Flynn and Angelloti didn't happen to slip into my domicile and find the note. If they had I'd be sunk. They can suspect all they want to, but hanging it on to me is another pair of boots, as the French say."

"Why, they wouldn't dare invade their own chief's house," Lanny protested.

"They wouldn't? You don't know those two bozos like I do. They'd dare anything if they figured they could get away with it."

"Can't you give the miserable snoopers an office job?" Lanny demanded. She was faintly provoked at Danie for his lack of initiative.

"Would you herd cows with a couple of horses that had won the derby?"

"Oh!"

"Wake that psychopathic nuisance up, Lanny, and get her down here. I've got to find out things or go crazy. Besides, she hasn't had any dinner."

"Let the poor lamb sleep, Dan," pleaded Lanny.

"I need a lot of sleep myself and I can't get it until I know how, when and where Nance and her gang made the getaway. Suppose Flynn and Angelloti let them make the getaway—suppose Flynn followed the men and Angelloti followed Nance? They'd do that; they wouldn't risk getting in Dutch with me by making the pinch as the gang came out of my house. They have some loyalty and a lot of common sense, and they know which side their bread is buttered on. When they take the girl they'll not turn her in to me. They'll waltz her straight back to San Quentin to the warden and let his men get the credit for recapturing her. All they want is the reward. Suppose they know she's here now and suppose they've seen me come here? Ouch! Murderation!"

"Have her down, Lanny," Stephen commanded in his operating room voice and Lanny had no alternative save to obey. So presently Nance came down the stairs with her. The girl was arrayed in an old faded dressing gown of Lanny's, her hair was tousled and she yawned sleepily.

"Hello, Stevie, old darling; hello Dan, you great big beautiful thing. Here I am."

"Sit down," McNamara invited in honeyed accents.

So Nance sat down promptly—on his tremendous knees—put her arm around his burly neck and kissed him. "Now, don't get excited," she cooed. "I know exactly what's burning you up, but you needn't worry. One of the boys recognized Angelloti, because he's the dick that pinched me the first time I got in Dutch. They kept circling the block in their car all the afternoon, and when it was almost dark we saw Flynn go into an alley alongside a vacant house across the street. We decided Angelloti had gone home for dinner. So we telephoned Angelloti's house and his wife said that he was eating his dinner, and unless it was important to call up in fifteen minutes. So we said it wasn't important, hung up and held a conference.

"We decided the back of the house wasn't guarded, so we telephoned the boy friend that met us at the yacht harbor that night, and he came and parked in the next street. We went out your back door, leaving the light in the front room burning and shinnied over the back fence. Some job for two members of the party, I'll say. Once over the fence we had to prowl through the back yard of the house that abuts against the rear of your house—and a dog bit me, but not very hard. We got out in front and into the next street before anybody could come out and see what luck the dog had had; our car was there and we beat it. We're pretty sure nobody followed us, but we drove out to the park first with our lights doused, and when we were sure nobody was trailing us, the boys brought me here. We jimmied your back door, Lanny dear; then the boys said good-by to me for keeps. It seems you don't want me associating with them any more and they think you're right about that, Dan."

Requisite in Family's Menu

Citrus Fruits, Cabbage, Lettuce, Spinach and Tomatoes, Both Raw and Canned, Are Liberally Supplied With Vitamin C.

If you have the orange and tomato juice habit which has swept the country in the last few years, you are probably getting your quota of vitamin C, which is found widely distributed among fruits and vegetables. The citrus fruits, cabbage, lettuce, spinach and tomatoes, both raw and canned, are particularly well supplied with this vitamin. Pineapples, apples, bananas, raspberries and strawberries, string beans, carrots, turnips, beans, peas, potatoes and radishes give us almost as liberal a contribution. Because sometimes the vitamin C content is injured during cooking, it is fortunate that most of these foods are delectable in their raw state. Both tomatoes and pineapples, however, because of their natural acids, keep their full content after cooking. This enables us to use these canned products with full confidence in their vitamin C supply.

When this vitamin is very low or absent, as has been the case in war times or on long voyages away from the source of the fresh food supply, the disease known as scurvy may afflict the community or the crew. Old records show that limes, lemons and potatoes were known as scurvy preventives and cures generations before the existence of vitamin C was recognized. While acute scurvy is seldom or never seen in this country, a condition of sub-scurvy, which retards the growth and the formation of good teeth has been found in cases of undernourished children. The symptoms are loss of appetite, sore mouth and tenderness of the joints. Some of the "growing pains" which were supposed to have been a natural affliction of childhood may have been caused by a chronic case of mild scurvy.

Plenty of fruits for breakfast, the use of vegetables and fruits liberally at the other meals in the form of salads and desserts, will provide us pleasantly with the essential vitamin C.

Clear Tomato Soup.

4 tablespoons butter
¼ cup each onion, carrot, celery, raw ham, cut up or diced
1 can tomatoes
½ teaspoon peppercorns
1 small bayleaf
3 cloves
2 sprigs parsley
3 sprigs thyme
Salt
Pepper
1 quart white soup stock

Cook onion, carrot, celery and ham in butter five minutes. Add tomatoes and seasonings and herbs and cook slowly for one hour. Strain carefully, add stock and season to taste.

Citrus Cocktail.

¼ cup lemon juice
¼ cup orange juice
¼ cup grapefruit juice
¼ cup sugar, few grains salt
1 cup mineral or iced water

Extract juice from the fresh fruits. Combine and pour over cracked ice in cocktail glasses. Garnish with mint sprigs or maraschino cherries.

Carrot, Cabbage, and Nut Salad.

2 cups carrots, cut in very fine strips
2 cups cabbage, finely shredded
⅓ cup vinegar
½ cup sour cream
½ cup mayonnaise
⅓ cup nut meats, finely chopped

Crisp carrots and cabbage by allowing them to stand in ice water. Drain, add vinegar, and chill 15 minutes. Drain and dry vegetables thoroughly. Whip cream slightly. When thick, fold in mayonnaise. Combine carrots, cabbage, and nuts and toss together lightly with sour cream and mayonnaise mixture. Serve on crisp lettuce or as a slaw.

World's Oldest Bible?

The director of the German Archeologic institute in Cairo recently discovered in an obscure Cairo bookshop what is said to be the world's oldest Bible. This Bible which is thought to have been written in the Second century, contains only the gospel according to St. Matthew, the letters of St. Paul, and portions of the Old Testament. The oldest Bible known previous to this find was written in the Fourth century.

When you signal a turn, do as you have signaled. Just hold out the arm when you want to slow down, turn, or stop. This will signify to following traffic that you are about to do something that requires space and time. It a warning. It is a courtesy that saves trouble. Whatever you do, do not expect that the man following you can read your thoughts. Always signal the right thing.

A signal properly given warns the driver behind to watch your car. Use your rear vision mirror constantly. Know what is behind you. Do not allow others in the car to give you advice or tell you how to drive. You alone are responsible for the manner in which your car is handled and you alone should handle the "reins".

The members of the Nazareth Lutheran Ladies Aid here presented Mrs. Ordahl with a beautiful hand quilted quilt which was embroidered with the names of all the members in a flower basket design, as a gift, on her 52 birthday which she celebrated on Sunday. The men folks of the party gave Rev. and Mrs. Ordahl a cash purse as a rememberance of the day.

Rev. Ordahl has not been feeling very well the past few months due to a stroke which he suffered last fall. He has been unable to serve his congregations and neighbor pastors have been helping out with the work. He is improving steadily now as the weather is getting warmer and hopes to be able to make a visit to Holt some time in the future.

Rev. and Mrs. Ordahl sent their heartfelt thanks and best regards to all their friends in Holt and community for the nice gift sent them.

National Hospital Day Sunday

Already fourteen whole years have elapsed since the first Hospital Day was observed. The originator of that National Day was Matthew O. Foley, late editor of the journal "Hospital Management". It is indeed with regret that we chronicle this man's passing which occurred on last Jan. 4, 1935, for all those who are at all familiar with hospital associations and administration recognize the fact that Mr. Foley, who was only 44 years of age at his death, was not only the founder of National Hospital Day but that he also has rendered a distinguished service to hospitals everywhere, and his demise radiates a feeling of great loss amongst hospital executives, associative officers and others who had known, admired and loved him for knowledge of hospital problems and his constant spirit of helpfulness. It was early in March 1921 that Mr. Foley launched his idea to the rest of his co-workers that there ought to be a special day set aside when hospitals everywhere throughout the nation should have open house for inspection by the public and community it serves. In quest of a fitting date for this National event it eventually entered his mind that the birthday of Florence Nightangale which is May 12th, should prove exceedingly appropriate because of her work for the improvement of hospitals and her outstanding annals of hospital management. It is to be remembered that she rendered immortal contribution to the elevation and developement of nursing as well. Hence hospitals and nurses may jointly honor her memory in this manner.

The Warren Hospital management and personnel finds it a great pleasure to extennd to its friends and former patients from far and wide their hearty invatations to visit our hospital on Sunday May 12th any time and hour from 1 P. M. to 9 P. M. that day.

If you have any doubts about hospitals, the quickest way to dispel them is to visit your hospital that day. That day is inspection day and you have the opportunity to see for yourself. Often times we are misinformed and blindly lead by some one else's misleading and false reports and rumors. Why not take advantage of this opportunity? Visit your hospital on National Hospital Day, Talk to the men and women who are giving their lives to healing the sick. Observe how smoothly everything runs. Learn something of the work the hospital is doing to keep contagious disease under control in your city or town. Your physician will tell you that in many cases, only the hospital can offer the equipment, surroundings and care conductive to a prompt and thorough recovery. Yet many people start to protrest when the doctor mentions the word "hospital". Why? Chiefly because being unfamiliar with the inside of a hospital they have formed their own erroneous opinion of what it is like. Above all else, discover for your self what a friendly, restful, quiet place a hospital really is. Watched over by physicians who understand heart and mind as well as body; tended by nurses who know that sympathy and affection are often as important as efficiency reveling in a succession of newfound comforts.

So here is a day set aside not to soiicit funds and aid of any kind, but merely to make you more familiar with hospitals and more conscious of the part they play in safeguarding the health of your community.

Come and discover what a haven of help the hospital really is. Each day men and women enter broken in body and spirit and afraid. And others leave, each day with new hope in their faces, new strength in their bodies and gratitude in their hearts.

So let us this year on May 12th, be your hostesses even to coffee and refreshments during that day.

Dorette E. Truedson R. N.,
Superintendent
Warren Hospital.

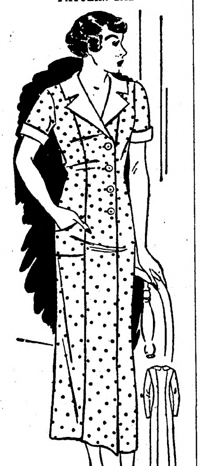
Perfection in Its Simplicity

PATTERN 2092



Every now and then some simple idea comes along and creates a furor—and every one wonders why it hadn't happened before! Like this perfectly grand house dress which has been designed. Its long coat lines make one appear slim as a rail while at work about the house, and it gives much freedom of movement. Its greatest feature, of course, is the fact you can slip it on and not be bothered by mussing your hair or twisting your neck—just a dive into it and it's on. It is attractive in colored cotton broadcloth, percale or pique print, substantial materials lending themselves well to its coat lines.

Pattern 2092 is available in sizes 16, 18, 20, 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46. Size 36 takes 4¼ yards 36 inch fabric and ¾ yard contrasting. Illustrated step-by-step sewing instructions included.

Send FIFTEEN CENTS (15c) in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for this pattern. Write plainly name, address, and style number. BE SURE TO STATE SIZE.

Address orders to Sewing Circle Pattern Department, 243 West Seventeenth Street, New York City.

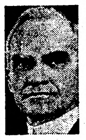
CURRENT EVENTS PASS IN REVIEW

PRESIDENT'S SOCIAL SECURITY BILL PASSED BY THE HOUSE—HITLER IS DEFIANT.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

©, Western Newspaper Union.

WITHOUT benefit of gag rule but with perfect party discipline, the administration's social security bill was jammed through the house substantially as President Roosevelt wants it. The final vote was 372 to 33. It may be some weeks before it is passed by the senate, for the senate finance committee, to which it was referred, is busy just now with NRA extension and veterans' bonus payment.



Speaker Byrns

Leading features of the measure as passed by the house are:

Grants to states for old age assistance (pensions) on a 50-50 basis, but for no individual will the federal government's share exceed $15 per month.

Compulsory old age benefits for persons over sixty-five on basis of salary earned during working lifetime, payments ranging from $15 to $85 a month. Income tax on pay rolls of employees starting with 1 per cent in 1937 and graduated upward to 3 per cent in 1949; excise tax on employers in same amounts. This will mean a total pay roll tax of 6 per cent by 1949.

Unemployment insurance. Tax on employer of 1 per cent on pay rolls in 1936, 2 per cent for 1937, and 3 per cent thereafter.

Social security board as new bureau of government in the executive branch with three members appointed by the President.

Federal grants to states for maternal and child health service, an appropriation of $3,800,000.

Federal grants to states for public health service, an appropriation of $8,000,000.

Speaker Byrns and other majority leaders were elated by the immense majority by which the bill carried because, as they asserted, it was put through without any pressure from the White House. Mr. Byrns said: "We got no orders from the President, so help me Almighty God."

GEN. HUGH JOHNSON'S earnest appeal for extension of the NRA, in the course of which he took all the blame for its failures, may have been effective, for it was reported that a considerable majority of the senate finance committee was in favor of continuing the life of the Blue Eagle organization. Three of the members, all Democrats, were listed as absolutely against prolongation of the recovery act, but most of the others favored such a course, provided various alterations are made. The committee had under consideration a bill introduced by Senator Pat Harrison, designed, he said, to stimulate discussion. The hottest battle will come on the floor of the senate.

GERMANY was thoroughly enraged by the action of the League of Nations council in adopting the tri-power resolution condemning the reich for violating the treaty of Versailles by rearming, and it was expected Reichsfuerher Hitler would make a defiant retort. As a first step he sent from his Bavarian retreat instructions to Secretary of State Von Buelow to protest "England's defection at Stresa and Geneva." This Von Buelow did, delivering the message to Ambassador Sir Eric Phipps for transmission to London.

Adolf Hitler

Then, on his forty-sixth birthday, came the reichsfuerher's defiance of the league, in the form of what the German foreign office called a "short but determined note." Here it is, as made public in Rome:

"The German government contests to the governments which in the council of the League of Nations took, in the deliberation of April 17, the right of making themselves judges over Germany. The government sees in the deliberation of the council of the league an attempt at new discriminations against Germany and therefore rejects it in the most resolute manner. The government reserves the right to make known soon its position on different questions touched upon in the deliberation."

This note did not seem to impress greatly the statesmen in London, Paris and Rome, but it mightily pleased Hitler's followers. They celebrated their leader's natal day with gusto and presented to him a fleet of about sixty war planes bought with popular contributions, most of which came from storm troopers.

RUSSIA was disappointed and disgusted when the French chamber failed to approve the mutual assistance pact which Litvinov and Laval had concocted. The delay was called officially a "temporary halt" in negotiations, and the treaty may be signed later provided the Soviet government promises to shut off the Communistic agitation in France. All the French radicals want the Russian alliance and so does one section of the conservatives; but another big group is opposed to any commitments, especialy with Russia. Also, there are many who still cling to the hope that Briand's old dream of a full Franco-German reconciliation may come true, though they don't say much about it in public.

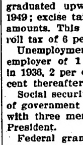
Russian and French papers revived the story that there was a secret military alliance between Germany and Poland, but this was vigorously denied by officials in both Berlin and Warsaw.

Communist parties of ten European countries united in an appeal to the working classes for a demonstration on May 1 against the German Nazis. The appeal, printed in the Communist party organ Pravda, charged that "German imperialists and their Japanese and Polish allies" are provoking war against Soviet Russia.

MORE than three thousand persons lost their lives in a series of earthquake shocks that occurred in the most thickly populated section of Formosa, the island off the Chinese coast which Japan acquired in 1895. It was the worst disaster of the kind in the Orient since the Tokyo-Yokohama quake of 1923. The number of injured was estimated at fully 12,000, and a quarter of a million were rendered homeless. Property damage was placed at $28,000,000. Half a dozen sizable towns and many villages were completely destroyed, and fires and heavy rain added to the dangers and distress of the afflicted people. Water systems were ruined and there was fear of epidemics. The Red Cross and the Japanese army officials organized relief expeditions immediately but progress was slow because railway lines and roadways were destroyed, as were telegraph and telephone lines.

Formosa lies in the Chino-Japanese earthquake belt and has suffered severely from temblors in the past. It is mountainous and is separated from the mainland by a narrow strait. Its populace is mainly of Chinese origin.

SENATOR HUEY LONG delivered his much advertised attack on the President and the administration before a crowd that jammed the senate chamber. He was limited to 40 minutes, but in that time he used a lot of language. After describing Ickes, Farley, Wallace and General Johnson in terms not very funny, the "Kingfish" assailed Mr. Roosevelt as personally responsible for what he called a plan to force the state of Louisiana to yield to corruption and debauchery. He threatened a tax rebellion in his realm if there were further federal encroachments in the matter of controlling the expenditure of federal loans for state projects.



Senator Long

Huey charged that the administration was concerned solely with controlling the expenditures in Louisiana in such manner as to insure winning the election in 1936.

"They could go down there and spend the whole five billion and they could not win that election," he said. "But they could load us with the five billion debt that we would have to pay as the result of carrying on their politics."

FATHER COUGHLIN of Detroit, the "radio priest" and earnest publicist, has now been endorsed by the bishop of Detroit, Rt. Rev. Michael Gallagher.

"I pronounce Father Coughlin sound in doctrine, able in its application and interpretation," the bishop said. "Freely I give him my imprimatur on his written word and freely I give my approval on the spoken word. May both be circulated without objection throughout the land. Under my jurisdiction he preaches the just codes of the old law and its commandments. Until a lawful superior rules otherwise, I stand steadfastly behind this priest, Father Coughlin, encouraging him to do the will of God as he sees it and I see it."

The Michigan unit of Father Coughlin's National Union for Social Justice held its first meeting. The priest described this as the first of a series of state meetings to put the "millions of members" of the union "to work to make themselves felt as a democratic force."

REPUBLICAN leaders who attended a luncheon in Washington given to William Allen White of Kansas turned the gathering into a real political meeting and in their speeches insisted that the Republican party must openly and vigorously attack the "fallacies of the New Deal."

Mr. White explained the conception of the regional meeting of eleven midwestern states to be held in Kansas next month and said that the amount of interest aroused among Republicans throughout the country was surprising. Such a regional meeting could do nothing more than write a creed and stir up the electorate to right thinking, he declared, adding:

"Confronted with new conditions, the Republican party must face this situation and write a platform that will be constructive and give promise of carrying out in a sane way the things needed to restore constitutional government."

DAUGHTERS of the American Revolution, in their convention in Washington, had their usual exciting and hotly contested election for president general. The candidates were Mrs. William A. Becker of New Jersey and Mrs. Flora Myers Gillentine of Tennessee, and the former won by a vote of 1,436 to 619. Mrs. Becker was attacked by her opponents because she had endorsed "The Red Network," a book in which Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, Secretary of Labor Perkins and other members of the administration are listed as Reds.

OVER in Turkey the women, until recently, were forced to lead lives of seclusion in the harem and to go veiled when in public. But all that is changed. The other day the twelfth congress of the International Alliance of Women for Suffrage and Equal Citizenship opened in Istanbul with about thirty nations represented and Mrs. Corbett Ashby of England in the chair, and the women of Turkey, unveiled and in modish European garb, were the proud hostesses of the hundreds of delegates. Among the questions discussed were: The situation and rights of women; the position of women in the liberal professions; the political and civil rights of women; the means women can use to prevent war.

Under Kemal's rule the women of the republic of Turkey have been granted parliamentary and city votes and have entered enthusiastically into all branches of life, civic, professional, industrial and sporting.

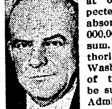
KING BORIS of Bulgaria has foiled another attempt to force him from his precarious throne. Upon discovery of an alleged Fascist plot, he ordered that three prominent political leaders be arrested and held in jail. Their friends sought to free them by storming the jail but were repulsed. Those seized are Alexander Zanhoff, leader of the Democratic entente; Kozma Georgieff, head of the Macedonian party, and M. Natcheff, former police president of Sofia. The two first named are former premiers.

It was expected in Sofia that Premier Petko Zlatteff and his cabinet would resign and that King Boris would appoint as head of the new government Dimo Kazasoff, minister to Juglosiavia.

ALLEGED teaching of Communism in some of our universities and the adoption of that cult by a large number of half-baked young men and women in those institutions has long been debated and denounced by patriotic citizens. Student strikes and small riots have been frequent, and there have been many demands for the suppression of these reds and pinks. The latest big institution of learning to be brought into the limelight in this matter is the University of Chicago, whose faculty contains several decidedly radical instructors and its student body many youthful followers of Marx and Lenin. Because of charges made by a prominent drug store magnate the Illinois senate has just adopted a resolution calling for a "thorough and complete investigation" by a senatorial committee of five to determine whether any foundation exists for charges that "subversive Communistic teachings" are going on in "wholly or partly tax-exempt colleges and universities of this state."

The action of the senate followed within a few hours action by the house in passing almost unanimously a bill to require an oath of allegiance and obedience to the state and federal constitutions from all teachers and professors. The legislatures of other states are passing similar laws.

WHEN the administration's great work relief program gets under way one of the most important parts of it, the purchase of material supplies, will have to be started at once, and it expected that this will absorb about $1,700,000,000 of the total sum. According to authoritative sources in Washington, this part of the program will be supervised by Rear Admiral Christian J. Peoples, now procurement officer in the treasury. Peoples entered the navy supply corps in 1900 as assistant paymaster and later developed the navy's present purchasing system. When Franklin D. Roosevelt was assistant secretary of the navy he and Peoples became close friends.



Admiral Peoples

The admiral presumably will have full charge of drafting the regulations for material purchases but it is understood the actual buying of supplies for work relief projects will in most instances be handled by the states and other co-operating agencies. However, certain commodities, like cement, that will be needed in immense quantities, probably will be purchased centrally.

AMELIA EARHART, our premier woman aviator, made a fine flight from Los Angeles to Mexico City, though she was forced to light first 60 miles north of her destination because a small insect got in her eye. Removing the bug, she continued to the capital, where ten thousand persons gave her an enthusiastic welcome. Amelia said that after seeing something of Mexico, she "hoped to do a better job of flying nonstop to New York."

SENATOR HARRISON'S compromise bonus bill, it was believed, might solve that troubling problem.

This measure would make bonus certificates mature in 1938, instead of 1945. They could be converted immediately into 3 per cent bonds. Veterans who wanted cash right away could sell the bonds, losing only the interest they otherwise could obtain until 1938. Harrison said this would cost $500,000,000 more than the present bonus law, but far less than the Patman bill, passed by the house, to pay the bonus with $2,500,000,000 in new money.

Milo Warner, vice commander of the American Legion, said this bill was "absolutely not acceptable" to that organization. Heads of veterans' organizations and various others were invited to testify at committee hearings on the bill.

At a baseball game a ball strikes ten-year-old Penelope on the nose. Mrs. Gatlin spirits the child to Europe. Gatlin wills Penelope all his money, and is about to begin a search for her when a motor accident ends his life. Some ten years later, in San Francisco, Stephen Burt, rising young psychiatrist, is presented by Dan McNamara, chief of police, with a new patient—Nance Belden, a girl with a dual personality, for which her "saddle nose" is in part responsible. McNamara does not think she is a criminal and obtains Burt's testimony in court. Lanny, the doctor's office nurse, is also won over. Nance's criminal record outweighs Doctor Burt's explanation of her case and she is sent to San Quentin penitentiary. Nance escapes, although shot, and goes to Lanny's apartment, from which, by McNamara's orders, she is removed to the chief's home. From one of the men in the boat on which the girl escaped McNamara learns that Nance's real name is Penelope Gatlin. He also discovers that she is heiress to $750,000. Fearful of McNamara, in his official capacity, Nance flees. Lanny finds her in her apartment, sound asleep, curled up on the guest-room bed.

"Did your men scout the street in front of this house before pulling up in front of it?" asked McNamara sharply.

"Certainly. We circled the block twice."

"Feed our Nance, Lanny," McNamara urged happily. "She's a smart girl. How's the shoulder, dearie?"

"Fine. It'll be O. K. in another week."

"So am I." Mr. McNamara grinned horribly. "Flynn's home eating his dinner now, and Angelloti must be on guard in that alley. I'm going to mistake Angelloti for a suspicious character, lurking there in the dark—and put a mark on him so I can recognize him later. He just can't stand to mix it with me, and get recognized, of course, so when he runs I'll fire in the air. He'll know who I am but he'll never suspect I know who he is."

McNamara bade Nance, Lanny and Stephen goodnight and hurried away in a taxi. A block from his home he alighted and walked down the side of the street opposite his own house. He was whistling softly as he came abreast of Angelloti's hiding place, where he turned at right angles, apparently with the intention of crossing in the middle of the street to his own house. A step from the curb he halted, turned, bent his head in a listening attitude, then stepped resolutely into the alley.

"Who's there?" he demanded. Receiving no answer, he got out a small flashlight; he seemed to have some difficulty flashing it on, for he cursed softly, and suddenly a beam from the flashlight illuminated his own face for an instant, but long enough, he decided, to permit the watchful Angelloti to recognize him. The alley was empty, but in a little garden strip a large syringa bush grew, and instinct warned the chief that his prey was behind it. So he walked past it, his flashlight held close to the bush, and as he had anticipated, it was snatched from him. As he turned, one of his stout legs was jerked from under him by a man crouching low; so, before permitting himself to topple backward, McNamara dropped his good right arm to the level of his knee and swung a short, stabbing punch. He felt a cheekbone and the side of a nose; so he punched again, a little higher up, and then fell over backward. Instantly his assailant rose and fled like a doe.

"Halt! I'm an officer." McNamara shouted, and fired into the air. But the running man did not even hesitate. In the morning he sent for Angelloti for a report on a certain case, and was charmed to note a faintly lemonish spot on the Italian's left cheek and a very noticeable iridescence under the left eye. The chief grinned. "What does the other fellow look like, Angie?" he queried innocently. "He couldn't have been more'n a flyweight or he'd have done more damage! How come you let some runt one-two you like that?"

"It was a dame I picked up for drunkenness," Angelloti lied with the glibness of long practice.

Following some discussion of the report, McNamara dismissed him, and sat down to decide what to do with Nance Belden. That Flynn and Angelloti were keeping his house under surveillance he knew now; undoubtedly they would enter his house at the earliest favorable opportunity.

The chief wondered what he would do if he stood in the shoes of his two detectives. "I'd wait for a night when I wouldn't be disturbed for a couple of hours," he decided. "What night would that be? Why, Thursday night, when the board of police commissioners meet and I am in attendance there. Stephen will make his usual early evening call—and as soon as he leaves the house those two will slip into it. The cellar door, of course. I'll make it easy for them. I'll leave the door unlocked."

He concluded that until then, Nance would be safe at Lanny's house. In the meantime, however, he must arrange to get her out of the city at an early date. The detectives were both absolutely satisfied Lanny had once given Nance sanctuary for a brief period; trust them, therefore, to keep an eye on Lanny's house.

He had in his office a telephone line that did not connect with the private exchange system in the central station, so he called Lanny on his phone at Doctor Burt's office now.

"Dan speaking, Lanny. Tomorrow morning you had better buy our pet nuisance a lot of clothes, so she'll be all ready to get out of town when I send for her. I think I'll have to fly her out and down to Tia Juana, Lower California."

"What will she do there?"

"I don't know. We'll think about that when she gets there. At least my two dicks won't be there and Tia Juana is one place where that saddle nose of hers won't surprise anybody. And when she acts rough and tough in Tia Juana nobody will pay any attention to her. They have experts down there in that line."

"I'll think that Tia Juana stunt over," Lanny decided. "It has possibilities. Is there a good hospital there?"

"I don't think so. Why?"

"You numbskull, Dan McNamara! We have to find a quiet hospital where we can have her poor nose operated on."

"Well, if we can get her beezer restored and change that black bob of hers to a movie-tone gold, she could take Flynn and Angelloti out to dinner and they'd never suspect her."

"Stevie says her nose must be operated on first. Her present state of dissociated personality probably started in an inferiority complex, and the inferiority complex probably arose out of the knowledge that her nose made her unlovely. When it's safe to bring her back to this city, Stevie will take her soul out and look at it, dust it off, put it back and do a Little Jack Horner."

"Can he do that?" McNamara's heavy voice was freighted with awe.

"He can, provided he can find a starting point for his investigation into her past life. There is always a reason for a dissociated personality. The ground for the mental shock that causes it is usually prepared long before the psychosis occurs. Rebellious thoughts, unhappiness, brooding—all these eventually have a serious effect upon sensitive and highly intelligent people and particularly, women of the hysterical type."

"All women are hysterical," McNamara said with conviction.

"You're a dear booby, Dan. Eight women out of ten can throw a fit of hysterics as easily as you'd break an egg, particularly if there is a man to be impressed. They never simulate hysterics to impress a woman, however, because they know better. However, there are women who have hysterics that are real, but it has been the experience of this office that most of these are just a trifle balmy—neurotics."

"Well, you get our girl a trousseau and warn her to keep away from the window and not to answer the doorbell, or do any telephoning, or leave the house until she has my permission. I don't expect she'll obey, so tonight when you go home have some hysterics to impress her."

"Dan, dear, I couldn't. I'm hard as a picnic egg. Did you stage your little comedy after leaving us last night?"

"I did—and it worked out exactly."

"Good gracious. Well, I'm busy. Good-by."

Nance Belden's personalities were a source of keen professional interest to Lanny, who regretted that for the present Doctor Burt was unable to share her observations with her. She had, as yet, had no opportunity for ascertaining anything regarding the girl's past history, but she had a suspicion that Nance had had advantages superior to most girls.

Her hands were the very first thing (with the exception of her poor wrecked nose) that Lanny had noticed. They were soft, shapely, small and well kept, decidedly not the hands of a factory girl. While her vocabulary was a trifle "salty," running at times to the idiom of the ill bred and ignorant, her voice was soft, with well bred intonations. Her clothing, on the occasion of her visit to Stephen Burt's office, had been, in Lanny's judgment, in splendid taste; rich but not flashy, up to the mode but not beyond it. Then, too, Nance had a slow, leisurely walk, she knew how to enter a room, she was sure of herself at all times without display assurance. To Lanny, the girl, in his abandoned moments, appeared to be amateurish, a bit of a showoff, unreal.

Thus far she had observed the girl only in this showoff phase of her personality. She was amazed, therefore, on coming home from the office after her conversation with McNamara, to find her a complete changeling. As she entered the house she caught the odor of cooking, and going into the kitchen, she discovered Nance, with one of Lanny's kitchen aprons on her, preparing dinner.

"Good evening, Lanny dear," she saluted her hostess. "It occurred to me it must be a very great trial to you, coming home night after night from the office, tired, and having to prepare dinner for yourself. I'm sure you're too tired most of the time to prepare more than a very sketchy meal, and that isn't good for you." She smiled. "So I thought I'd have a nice dinner for you."

"Now, I call that real sweet, Nance."

"My name isn't Nance, Lanny. It's Penelope."

"Penelope what?"

"Penelope Gatlin. Silly old Lanny, how could you forget?"

"You've placed your finger on my dread secret, Penelope. When I'm tired my memory fails me."

Lanny knew that during the day a psychological door had opened and Nance Belden, otherwise personality B, the abnormal, had walked through it and emerged Penelope Gatlin, or personality A, the normal. Also, she knew now that Penelope Gatlin probably had more or less amnesia for her former personality as Nance Belden. Lanny had heard Doctor Burt discuss such rare cases and she glowed with pride in the knowledge that at least he had secured a perfect specimen.

"I decided we wouldn't have broiled lamb chops, Lanny," the girl went on brightly, "so I've made a ragout."

"You mean, in good old Americanese, you've concocted an Irish stew."

"You're so amusing, Lanny. A stew, of course. The difference between a stew and a ragout is entirely geographic. A ragout in France, an Irish stew in the United States."

"Have you lived in France?"

"Eight years, Lanny. Went to school in Switzerland and learned French there."

"Are your people French?"

"I think I was there alone." The girl appeared puzzled. "I don't remember my mother, but I had a father. He was such a dear, but he's dead."

"Were you happy there?"

"No, I was perfectly miserable."

"Why?"

"Because my father wasn't with me. We'd been such pals."

"But you must have lived with somebody."

"There was Laurette, the cook, and Babette, the maid."

"Did you graduate?"

"No, I left school when father died. He was killed in a motor accident en route to Europe. I've always had a feeling he was coming over to see his Penelope. He loved me very much, Lanny. He was adorable. He used to tell me that I was all that made his life bearable. Somebody—I forgot who—told me he wasn't my real father, that I was a foundling he adopted. I wouldn't believe that at first, but when I read his will I knew it was so."

"What sort of woman was his wife—or did he have one?"

"I haven't the slightest idea, but I remember the will stated very positively that he had settled with her, that she had accepted the settlement in full satisfaction of her dower rights, and he made my income from the trust just sufficient to support me decently until I should come of age. He said in his will that he did this not because of any lack of affection for me, but because if he made me an excessive allowance, his divorced wife would have control of it during my minority. He must have despised her."

"Well, if she could have control of your income during your minority, she must have been your adopted mother," the practical Lanny reasoned. "And you must have lived with her following the divorce. That's why you didn't see your father in Europe. You must have been there with your foster mother. Laurette, the cook, and Babette, the maid, argue an establishment. Do you remember everything that has happened to you since that day Dan McNamara brought you to Doctor Burt's office?"

"Perfectly."

"Ever have funny thoughts about it?"

The girl stared at her shrewdly. "How strange that you should ask that question, Lanny. I do have funny thoughts. Sometimes I'm horrified at the memory and could die of shame; at other times it seems perfectly all right, but those are the times when I've been nervous and sleepless; sometimes I think there's something wrong with me, because people often refer to me as Nance Belden and to things I've done and which I know very well I haven't done. And yet it seems to me sometimes as if I had—just a wraith of memory, like an old dream. But still I'm strong and healthy."

"But a little given to spells of nervousness?"

"I'm moody." The girl seemed interested in herself to an unusual degree. "Some days I like to do things that are perfectly intolerable to me on other days. Some days I'm so democratic I could go out to dinner with a garbage man—other times I can't bear to be with anybody but nice people." She sighed and turned to inspect her savory ragout. "I wish I knew what I wanted in life and I wish I knew somebody that wanted me. Of course I can pay my way through life, but it's terrible to be lonely, Lanny."

She faced Lanny again. "Now, when I decided to cast myself on your hospitality, Lanny, it seemed to me the most natural thing in the world to do. But today I'm covered with confusion. I've deliberately imposed myself upon your peace and privacy."

"Listen here, Penny, my dear. You aren't the only lonely woman in this world. Believe it or not, the first spring buttercup isn't a bit more welcome in old lady Lanning's house than you are."

The lost one beamed upon her. "I believe that Lanny. Oh, Lanny, when I'm happy I'm so happy and when I'm wretched I'm so wretched."

"You think too much about that nose of yours, my poor child."

The girl's hand flew to that organ (automatically, Lanny thought) as if she would hide it. "Isn't it terrible?" she quavered. "I'm so ugly nobody can ever love me."

Wise to Allow Reason to Govern Discipline

OLIVE ROBERTS BARTON, in the New York World-Telegram.

It is difficult to explain to a mother two sides of a question in one day's column.

I hear things like this: "One day, Mrs. Barton, you advise us to allow our children to finish tasks. A few weeks later you say that postponement is the easiest habit to learn and to guard against it by making children come when they are called."

The trouble is that mothers have difficulty in dividing time. There is the formative period, very early years, when we are trying to instill character and foster concentration. During this time it is wise "whenever possible" or as often as routine will permit, to allow a child to finish his ideas.

It cannot be permitted always, of course, but there is no question that interruption after interruption when a little child is engrossed in some definite plan makes him irritable, confused and tends to carelessness and irresponsibility. Such thwarting, if persisted in, strikes at the very root of concentration as well as the habit of finishing a job once started.

Now we come to the older brother or sister.

While there is still need for them to go on cultivating concentration and being allowed to carry a thought or act to a finish, they have developed "reason." And reason tells them that they can "resume" the game or the book at another time. There is great need of obedience, and it cannot always be argued about.

"I'll be there in a minute," is their first alibi. It shouldn't be, unless the parent is a short-grained, small-patienced person who becomes so unreasonable as to invite protest.

I believe any mother can figure out quite easily when to allow her children to finish some engrossing event. She can certainly see when they are taking advantage of her.

Common sense, the fitness of things, the time, occasion and circumstance all must govern discipline. There are times to build up and times to break down. The early years are planting years, most softly sympathetic. The hardier plant expects some storms and stands them.

ALL ALIVE-O!

A prehistoric nursery of frogs has come to light as a result of the operations of a party of workmen in sand quarries at Washington, near Sunderland. Last summer the men found themselves besieged, day after day, by armies of tiny frogs. There was no water, no moisture, no spawn to account for their presence. Yet they continued swarming in myriads. Now, it is established, the frogs were being hatched out by the sun from eggs buried by an upheaval about 25,000 years ago.

The frogs were blind, of a peculiar sand color, and, most remarkable of all, developing from the egg embryo into the frog, dispensing with the tadpole stage. This living lesson on evolution must be one of the most wonderful on record.—London Tit-Bits.

Old Superstition

If two tea stalks appear on the surface of a cup of tea they are to be placed on the back of the left hand and struck with the back of the right; if they remain unmoved on the left, or adhere to the right, then the loved one will remain true; but if one adheres and the other not, she will be false.

Every school in the country should have a safety program. Whether the school is located in the country or in the city should make no difference. There should be a school police and a school patrol operated and governed by the students themselves. Public officials should take an active part in such a program by sponsoring it and organizing it for the pupils. The public officials in any community are primarily responsible for the safety of the citizens, especially on the streets and in other public places.

Schools in many communities now have safety patrols and safety clubs. A school safety campaign or program to be effective must be permanent and continous.

Opening Band Concert

The Holt Community Band will on Thursday evening, May, 23, at 8 o'clock p. m., give their opening band concert here at the village band stand in Holt.

The band has been doing some fine rehearsal work the past few months and are coming out this spring with a new line of music that has never been heard here before. The local band is one of the most active organizations that we have here and we ask that the people of this community will show their appreciation for what the boys are doing by coming out to the concert next Thursday evening.

A free will offering will be taken up during the concert to help the band buy more new music for the summer season and to defray other small expenses in connection with their work.

Let us all plan to go and give them a big hand as they start the concert season and encourage the work they are doing for the community.

TRENDS FAVORABLE IN STATE BANKING

Recent Figures Indicate Large Increases in Deposits and Invested Funds

Improvement in the condition of state banks in almost every respect during 1934 is shown by statistics recently assembled, Robert M. Hanes, President Wachovie Bank and Trust Company, Winston-Salem, North Carolina, points out in an article in "Banking" published by the American Bankers Association. The figures on which this statement is based were gathered by the Committee on State Bank Research of the association from reports furnished by state bank supervisors throughout the country.

"Ever since 1921 the number of state banks has been declining," Mr. Hanes says. "Between 1931 and 1934 the decline was rapid. Figures for December 31, 1934, showed that the downward trend has not yet ended, but the decline last year was the smallest in twelve years."

There are now, he says, about ten thousand state banks, which term includes all state chartered institutions with the exception of mutual savings banks. The article continues:

"Even more significant was the ending of the decline of deposits in state banks which had been going on since the collapse of the stock market boom in 1929. In recent years for which figures are available the drop has been particularly abrupt. Total deposits in state banks declined from $20,395,762,000 on December 31, 1931, to $15,424,823,000 on December 31, 1933. The record for 1934 shows a recovery to $17,508,766,000 at the year-end.

Significance of Increased Deposits

"It is particularly gratifying to note the expansion of deposits, since it was their decline which made necessary the liquidation of investments, the calling of loans, and all the other phenomena which go under the name of 'deflation' and have brought banks so much criticism in recent years. It is now plain that this was due to efforts of the banks to place themselves in the possession of enough liquid assets to meet the growing demands of depositors for the return of a part of the money which had been placed on deposit.

"That this is true is borne out by the movement of invested funds of state banks, which has paralleled that of deposits. These invested funds (loans and discounts plus investments) for state banks, dropped from $20,291,320,000, at the end of 1931, to $14,915,773,000 at the end of 1933. By December 31, 1934, however, they had recovered to $15,769,510,000. All of this gain is accounted for by the increase in investments during 1934, the expansion amounting to approximately $1,300,000,000.

"As for loans and discounts, they registered a slight drop again in 1934, but the rate of decline was much smaller than in previous years, which in itself is progress. Whereas the drop in loans and discounts amounted to approximately $3,300,000,000 in 1932, and to approximately $1,300,000,000 in 1933, it was less than $500,000,000 in 1934.

"In another respect the balance sheet figures for December 31, 1934, were especially impressive. Bills payable and rediscounts of the state banks, which at the end of 1932 had reached a depression high of $669,709,000, had dropped by the close of last year to the low figure of $82,101,000. One must search the records as far back as 1917 to find bills payable and rediscounts of state banks at a lower figure. Moreover, it is reasonable to expect a further reduction of such borrowings during the current year."

F. K. Fredrickson closed a deal last week with the Kezar boys at Viking in which he became the owner of an 80-acre tract of land joining the well improved quarter section he purchased recently from Mr. Kirby.

CCC Camp In Mud Lake

Four adnitional CCC camps will be established about June 15 in Beltrami, Marshall and Lake of the Woods counties, according to an announcement received from Congressman R. T. Buckler's office in Washington, D. C. Congressman Buckler had been so adviced by Robert C. Fechner director of the Emergency Conservation Works.

Two of the camps will be located in Bertrami county, with one having its postoffice at Bagley and the other at Blackduck. The first will be a state forest camp to be knows as S-98, while the latter will be a federal forest camp designated as F-50.

Another state forest camp will be located near Faunce in Lake of the Woods county. This camp had been previously built and used but recently has not been occupied. It will be repaired and reconstruced at a cost of about $3,000 and re-occupied some time in June. It will be known as S-56.

A bird refuge camp will be established at Mud Lake, in this county, with Middle River as its postoffice. It will be known as BF-1.

Approximately $20,000 will be spent in the construction of each of the three new camps. With about 200 young men in each camp it will also mean an expenditure on the basis of about $5 per month per man, or about $1000 in the community where the camp is located. Purchases for food rations made in the vicinity of the camp will amount to about $1,800 per month. Other expenditures will bring the expenditures up to from $3,000 to $5,000 per month in each of the communities where the camps are located, Mr. Fechner's office reports.

Resigned Secretary Job

T. B. Folden, Secretary of the the Farmers' Creamery here for many years, last week resigned that position. He feels that he is too old to be burdened with such work now and wants to retire from all kinds of office work so he can have more time on his farm

Walter Larson, local manager of the creamery, took over the job as secretary in connection with managing the institution. Oscar Fosholm was hired as second man to assist Wm. Davis, assistant buttermaker, with the work.

Company Changed Officers

The Farmers' and Village Switchboard company here held their annual meeting last week and elected officers and checked up the business of the firm for the past year. Clarence Larson of Excell was elected as director taking the place of Fred Stienhauer. The other directors are C. A. Davis and Wm. Paskewitz.

T. B. Folden who has held the job as secretary resigned that work and Hartley Peterson, local manager of the company here took over that end of the business. Mr Peterson was also appointed repair man.

4-H Day In Churches

June 2, 1935 has been designated as 4-H Sunday in church. 4-H work is being recognized as one of the great character building movements for young people. A complete charater includes the spiritual development. The objective of 4-H work is to help young people understand, appreciate and use for their development what the Creator has so generously given in rural life.

In order to emphasize the character building values of 4-H work and to stimulate a closer contact between this work and the church, the plan of designating June second as 4-H Sunday in church has been suggested and worked out by T. A. Erickson, statle club leader, University Farm, St. Paul.

In scores of communities, local 4-H leaders and local ministers are already busy arranging special programs and services for the day. Here are some of the things different communities are planning; urge all 4-H members to attend church and have them invite parents and friends; club members may wear the 4-H uniforms or 4-H emblem if they have them. Have all the club members sit together in a group if possible. Some churches are planning to ask 4-H members to act as ushers, decorate the church with flowers for the occasion, and provide special music and talks; and pastors will emphasize the part of 4-H work in character building.

Mr. T. A. Erickson has prepaired a brief message which may be read as part of the services.

Rural churches have an active and growing interest in 4-H club work, recognizing it as one of todays most dynamic forces for the improvement of rural young people. 4-H club Sunday will provide the occasion and incentive for both 4-H groups and churches to take part in activities that will strengthen and cement the bonds of mutual interest.

Bigger Patches-Bigger Pay

I have been thinking that I should put in a big crop this year but as I look thru the files of the Holt Weekly News of years past I find a poem that reads as follows:

Ways and methods oft remind me
That a farmer has no chance
The more we work there grows behind us
Bigger patches on our pants.

Once our pants were new and dressy
Now have stripes of different hue
Just because we don't get paid for Anything we have to do.

Now I would like to know if this is a real fact or only a dream?

Jim

Editors note:

Our answer to your question is that it would make a lot of difference if we were sure whether or not the author of the quoted poem was a real farmer or just a dreamer. But what is the difference. Our advice to you would be to put in many acres this year and this fall you may harvest a bifi crop and consequently a big pay check will find its way into the pockets of your old pants and then you can invest in a new streamline pair.

SYNOPSIS

Theodore Gatlin adopts a baby, "Penelope," in an effort to solve his matrimonial troubles. But his wife has never wanted her, and their affairs end in the divorce court. At a baseball game a ball strikes ten-year-old Penelope on the nose. Mrs. Gatlin spirits the child to Europe. Gatlin wills Penelope all his money, and is about to begin a search for her when a motor accident ends his life. Some ten years later, in San Francisco, Stephen Burt, rising young psychiatrist, is presented by Dan McNamara, chief of police, with a new patient—Nance Belden, a girl with a dual personality, for which her "saddle nose" is in part responsible. McNamara does not think she is a criminal and obtains Burt's testimony in court. Lanny, the doctor's office nurse, is also won over. Nance's criminal record outweighs Doctor Burt's explanation of her case and she is sent to San Quentin penitentiary. Nance escapes, although shot, and goes to Lanny's apartment, from which, by McNamara's orders, she is removed to the chief's home. From one of the men in the boat on which the girl escaped McNamara learns that Nance's real name is Penelope Gatlin. He also discovers that she is heiress to $750,000. Fearful of McNamara, in his official capacity, Nance flees. Lanny finds her in her apartment, sound asleep. Several days later her partially restored memory leads her to tell Lanny of her wealthy father, Theodore Gatlin, and of her girlhood in France.

"Quit that," Lanny commanded in her most ferocious manner. "If I hadn't found you lovable I wouldn't have you in my house this minute. I'd turn you over to Flynn and Angelloti. By the way," she continued, "how did you get that sock on the beezer?"

"Father took me to a baseball game and a long drive flew into the bleachers and struck me on the nose. Lanny, you mustn't use slang. It isn't polite."

"I wrap myself around a highball when I'm tired or want to be sociable, and I smoke cigarettes," Lanny protested. "I suppose a perfect lady wouldn't do those things, either?"

"A perfect lady may without marring her perfection, old fuss-budget. That's a matter of personal liberty, and only becomes distressing when carried to excess. But there's no excuse for a highly intelligent and cultured woman to employ the language of the streets."

"I have my human moments," Lanny excused herself meekly.

"I'll set the table in the dining room. Won't you order some flowers? And Lanny—I'll do something for you some day."

"For instance?"

"Well, have you ever been to Europe?"

"Certainly not."

"Then I'll take you."

"I accept the nomination. In return I'll do something else for you. I'll have that nose of yours split open, the shattered bone of the bridge scraped out and a cute little piece of pliable cartilage whittled off one of your spare ribs, and grafted into your funny nose to form a new bridge. Then the doctor will sew your nose together again over it—"

"What's the difference between having a nose like a Pekinese and a makeshift with a big scar on it, I'd like to know?"

"Oh, there won't be any scar, dearie. The surgeon will cut a strip of epidermis off your forehead and without detaching it from your forehead, bring the flap down, drape it over your new scarred nose and graft it there. It will grow and cover the scar, and when everything's lovely, that skin connection with your forehead will be severed and the ragged edges trimmed and presently nature will do the rest. Six months after the operation I'll defy anybody but an expert to discover you've got a custom-made nose."

The girl's eyes shone. "Is it true, Lanny, is it true? It's so hard to believe in miracles."

"Science pulls 'em off daily, my dear."

Nance changed the subject. "Here, here, we're gabbling like a pair of geese. The linen, woman, where's the linen? Off with your hat and coat. While you're getting it I'll run upstairs and get your mules."

"After dinner I must do some more pumping," thought Lanny. "The information will be invaluable to Stephen. Strange case! Total amnesia sometimes, only partial amnesia at others. Dreadful mixture."

When Dan McNamara came home about midnight from the regular weekly meeting of the police commission, he found his ex-convict guest up and waiting for him. "I had two burglars here tonight, about ten o'clock, Chief," he announced.

The chief sat down and loaded his pipe. "I was expecting them, my boy. Did they ask you any questions?"

"No. They just searched the house. I don't think they touched anything except the lipstick on the bureau over there," he said.

"Did they take the lipstick?" Dan asked.

"They didn't take it, they looked at it." McNamara sighed. The case was getting a little thick for him when it became complicated with lipsticks. He went to the telephone and got Stephen Burt out of bed.

"Did a certain party, while a guest at my house, ask you to bring out a lipstick when you called in the course of your professional duties, Doctor?"

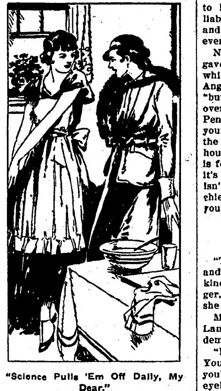
"Oh, yes."

"Thanks. Goodnight." McNamara hung up and went to the room lately occupied by Nance Belden. On the bureau he found a lipstick. "Vanity is always the undoing of a crook," he sighed and went to bed, greatly troubled in his mind at what was, to him, indubitable knowledge that Flynn and Angelloti, even though they had failed to find their quarry, must be convinced, beyond the shadow of a doubt, that he had harbored an escaped convict in his home.

He passed a sleepless night, but he did some solid thinking, so there was no lost time. He had hoped, by providing this sick convict as an excuse for Doctor Burt's nightly visits, to throw Flynn and Angelloti off the scent—and now the scent was hotter than ever.

"Now, what will they do? They're morally certain she went to Lanny's house the night she escaped and that Lanny got her out of there in the nick of time and took her here. Now that she's escaped them here they may suspect she'd doubled back to Lanny's house. Murderation! However, those two dicks will never bother her without fortifying themselves with a search warrant. They'd be too afraid of me. But with a search warrant and the girl to show for their pains they'll have me foul. I couldn't open my mouth—if they bring the girl into headquarters I'll have to give them a cheer and congratulate them."

He decided Flynn and Angelloti would sleep on their evidence and the suspicions it had aroused, compare notes in the morning and decide upon a course of action. They would have to adduce some nominal evidence to support their suspicion before the district attorney would consent to issue the search warrant, for a search warrant is not issued lightly. In the morning they would induce some stool-pigeon to tell the district attorney that he had seen Nance Belden's face at the window of Lanny's home. Possibly they might induce the patrolman on that beat to stretch the truth a little.



"Science Pulls 'Em Off Daily, My Dear."

"I can't get Nance out of Lanny's house tonight and I can't get her out in daylight tomorrow, but I must get her out tomorrow night," he decided. "But how?"

He was at his office at eight next morning. At eight-thirty he looked into the detectives' room and saw Flynn and Angelloti in profound conference. Half an hour later he stepped out of a taxi two blocks from Lanny's house, and when the cab had disappeared, he made his way to the house and was admitted by Lanny.

"Nance has got to make a clean get-away," he assured her earnestly, "because tonight Flynn and his pal may come with a search warrant. The district attorney will probably call me up before he issues it and I'll have to tell him to go ahead and issue it, in order to allay suspicion. Now, here are half a dozen harmless hand grenades that burst on impact. Three of them are tear gas bombs and three are stink bombs.

"Now, I'll tell you exactly how they'll make the pinch. They'll not come during the day, because they'll know you aren't at home and that Nance wouldn't answer that bell anyhow. But tonight, one of them will ring the front doorbell and shove the search warrant under your nose and step inside. The other will, in the meantime, have gone around to your back door to prevent the girl's escape in that direction. There's a cement floor around your kitchen door, is there not?

"Yes. Well, when the doorbell rings, you answer it. That will be Nance's tip to peek out the second story window and lob three bombs down on the cement beside whoever she sees standing there. They explode with a sound like a gunshot and diffuse their gas almost instantly over a considerable area. Now, whichever one goes to the back door will never be expecting a citizen to shower this sort of bomb down on him, because they are not accessible to citizens; so he will think they're electric light bulbs tossed down to scare him away. By the way, have Nance toss one electric light bulb down first and then follow with two tear bombs—here, I'll make a mark with my pencil on the tear bombs. Before he realizes what has happened he'll be weeping like Niobe and unable to see anything in the darkness.

"But bear this in mind, Lanny. He'll not desert his post. He'll hug the back door and be ready to grab her when she comes. He'll stick it out. That's the time Nance must drop a stink bomb beside him.

"Meanwhile the man in front will hear the explosions. If the one in back cries out, the one in front will figure he has been shot and will run to the back door to help him. As he opens the back door his pal will grab him. You must follow at his heels and shut and bolt the door instantly, or you'll get yours, too. There will be a momentary struggle between Flynn and Angelloti in the dark because the front door man will think he has the scoundrel that hurled the bombs; and by the time they discover each other's identity, the front door man will be as sightless and ill as the back door man.

"Nance, a word to you now."

"My name is Penelope Gatlin, Dan."

"My error. Penelope, the instant you drop those first two bombs, shut down the window. And, remember, all the lights in the rear of the house and particularly in the kitchen must be turned off. When the front door man is struggling with his pal and Lanny has closed the door, her scream will be your cue to open the window again, just long enough to pay the rest of your eggs on the scrimmage. You must be dressed for the street and have some money in your pocket. Got any?"

"No."

"Here's two hundred."

"I'll send you my check. Thanks." And she took the money.

"Immediately after tossing the last of the bombs, close the window and beat it downstairs and out the front door. I'll leave a coupe, with the motor running, parked at the curb across the street. Can you drive?"

"I can drive, Dan."

"Very well, then. Climb into the car and beat it."

"Beat it where?"

"Los Angeles, San Diego, anywhere. Keep on going, and when you get there, send me a wire to the central station merely giving your address. Then lay low until somebody comes after you. Keep off the street. Lanny, you must disguise her nose. Clamp a wadding of cotton and a neat dressing over it to hide the dish in it. Any lady is liable to have an injury to her nose and wear a dressing on it. Now, is everything understood?"

Nance nodded, and Lanny's silence gave consent. "You'll probably get a whiff of what's good for Flynn and Angelloti," McNamara advised Lanny, "but you'll get over it. When you lob over the last of your rotten eggs, Penelope, do not breathe, and close your eyes tightly until you have closed the window again. Then—out of the house like a shot. This plan of mine is fool-proof if followed absolutely, but it's you for San Quentin again if it isn't, my brave lassie, and all the chiefs of police in town cannot help you then."

CHAPTER VIII

"Thank you, sir," said Nance politely and with quiet dignity. "You are most kind to take this trouble for a stranger, and I shall never forget it." And she held out her hand.

McNamara looked in puzzlement at Lanny. "What's happened to her?" he demanded.

"I'll explain to you some time. You're a brilliant chief of police and you've figured everything out to a gnat's eyelash for Penelope, but what's going to happen to me?"

"The concoction of the plan I've just outlined has given me brain fag, Lanny. It's cost me a night's sleep. I don't know what's going to happen to you and I don't care much. You're a smart woman, and if you can't figure a way out of your end of the mess don't call on me for help."

"I wish I could relish that compliment," Lanny retorted dryly. "However, if you think I'm not going to laugh myself sick over this you're a poor judge of women. Good-by, you old crook, and God bless you. Kiss him, Penelope."

A becoming modesty caused the girl to hesitate just a little, then she came to the chief and implanted a most lady-like kiss on his blue jowl. "You're very kind, Mr. McNamara," she assured him again.

"Cripes," he muttered and went off.

Dan McNamara's estimate of the ability of Detective Sergeants Flynn and Angelloti did them no injustice; indeed, they proved even smarter than their chief credited them with being. Angelloti's adventure with Dan McNamara they passed over as an unavoidable accident; Angelloti was certain McNamara had not recognized him. He felt certain McNamara had no suspicion that his house was under surveillance, although Flynn had mental reservations on that point, for the Irish are a psychic race.

After watching Doctor Burt enter and leave the chief's house on Thursday night, when they knew the chief would not be home until midnight, they decided to investigate. The unlocked cellar door gave them pause; Flynn whispered that he was always suspicious of things that came too easy. They crept upstairs and found Dan McNamara's ex-convict guest reading in bed. Both detectives recognized him, so while Angelloti guarded him Flynn made a hurried but thorough search of the premises. They were not in the house more than five minutes.

Williston.—North Dakota Catholic Daughters closed their biennial convention here following a business session at which they re-elected all state officers.

Langdon.—Plantings of trees on 13 Cavalier county farms to demonstrate the practical value of shelterbelts will be made this spring under a co-operative arrangement made with the state forestry nursery.

Fargo.—The Veterans hospital at Fargo may obtain a 100-bed addition at a cost of perhaps $100,000 to construct and equip a wing, as request made by the North Dakota department of the American Legion.

Williston.—H. E. Bowen of the Heggen Motor company at Williston, in Zone E, was awarded the first prize of $100 in the finals in the branch sales presentation contest of the Ford Motor company in Fargo.

Grand Forks.—William Holland of Grand Forks will receive the annual $20 award given by former Governor George F. Shafer to the most outstanding member of the University of North Dakota's Hesperia literary society.

Bismarck.—Ten modern homes will be built at Minot and 15 at Dickinson under the federal housing administration's insured mortgage plan. Field surveys show the housing shortage at Dickinson is one of the most acute in the state.

Ray.—After escaping through a window from his burning farm house, P. O. Eggen, 60-year-old bachelor residing west of here, with his clothing partly burned away, ran three-quarters of a mile through falling snow to the home of a neighbor.

Grand Forks.—The city will be visited June 28 by a motor tour from Winnipeg, a tour which incorporates a circle route from Winnipeg to Duluth to Fort Williams to Kenora to Winnipeg. The Winnipeg Tribune is sponsor of the motorcade.

Fargo.—Fargo's guest army of gleeful Boy Scouts enjoyed the third annual Merit Badge exposition here with 2,000 in attendance. Topping the list was Valley City Troop No. 58, given the unofficial rating as the best appearing troop in the exposition.

Sanish.—Immediate construction of a power dam at a feasible point in the upper Missouri river by the federal government was urged at a meeting of the Upper Missouri River Development association here. More than 600 persons attended the session.

Dickinson.—Shortly after receiving a 15-year sentence for kidnaping a farmer's wife and two children, Mike Bader of Taylor, attempted to commit suicide by slashing his arm with a razor. He is in serious condition at a hospital in Dickinson.

Fargo.—With 200 boys participating, the annual "Y" revue, sponsored by the Fargo Y. M. C. A., was presented in the Central high school auditorium. Included in the program was apparatus work, demonstration of popular recreational athletics, instruction in the modern form of wrestling, tumbling, and a variety of clown tactics.

Finley.—Sheriff D. A. Wennerstrom returned here with "Dick" Lee, charged with participation in the murder of Dave Stewart, Hope marshal, on Aug. 14, 1933. Lee was arrested at Childress, Texas. Wennerstrom for 15 months tediously followed their movements, tracing them across nine states before arresting them.

Jamestown.—G. D. Roth, Philco distributor for this territory, will sail on the Queen of Bermuda from New York for a week's cruise to Jamaica as the guest of the Philco Corporation, May 18. Mr. Roth and the Chicago distributor were the only dealers in the midwest to achieve 100 per cent of their sales quotas on all items. In addition Mr. Roth oversold his quota on house radios by 20 per cent.

Watford City.—Rev. Michael Daugherty, about 60, Catholic priest at Alexander, died at the CCC camp here following a heart attack. Rev. Daugherty had held services at the camp and was returning to Watford City when he encountered muddy roads and stopped to put on chains, which exertion is thought to have brought on the heart attack. He had apparently lain unconscious for several hours.

KINDNESS

Kindness resembles long-suffering in finding its chief objects in the evil and unthankful, but while the latter is passive and self-contained, kindness is an active, busy virtue. She is, moreover, of a humble and tender spirit, stooping to the lowest need, thinking nothing too small in which she may help, ready to give back blessing for cursing, benefit for harm and wrong. Kindness is the thoughtful insight, the delicate tact, the gentle ministering hand of love. —Findlay.

MID-LIFE

The besetting infirmity of people in middle age is the notion that they have probably experienced most of what life has to offer and that when they pass, as it were, the crest of the hill, the rest of life is either a repetition of what has gone before or is in the nature of a decline. I am quite sure that is the mind of a good many men between forty-five and fifty. It is a very deadening state of mind. Surely one's faith in life ought to include the belief—which is a very well-founded belief—that as a matter of fact life gets richer and fuller as it goes on; that as we burden ourselves with increased responsibilities and sacrifice a great deal of our liberty, instead of impoverishing life, we enrich it.—Canon W. T. Elliott.

ROOSEVELT'S RADIO CHAT IS OPTIMISTIC—VIEWS OF BUSINESS LEADERS.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© Western Newspaper Union.

HIGH optimism marked the "fireside chat" which President Roosevelt delivered over the radio to the people of America, which people, he said, are, as a whole, "feeling a lot better—a lot more cheerful than for many, many years." He asserted we are already on the unmistakable march toward recovery, and told how he means to promote the return to normal conditions with his works relief program. He promised to put to work three and a half million persons now on the relief rolls, and to press for enactment of legislation he considers necessary for carrying on the New Deal.

President Roosevelt

Only once did Mr. Roosevelt allude to such critics of his administration as Senator Long, Father Coughlin and Governor Talmadge. He said:

"The overwhelming majority of people in this country know how to sift the wheat from the chaff in what they hear and what they read. They know that the process of the constructive rebuilding of America cannot be done in a day or a year, but that it is being done in spite of a few who seek to confuse them and to profit by their confusion."

These six "fundamental principles," said the President, must guide the work relief program: Projects must be useful, most of the money must go for labor, "a considerable proportion of the costs" must be returned to the treasury, only those projects which can employ persons on relief will be approved, and projects will be approved in a given area in proportion to the unemployed in that area.

Admitting that graft will creep into such vast and speedy spending as his program calls for, the President asked citizens to help him make this "the most efficient and cleanest example of public enterprise the world has ever seen" and thus to give "a smashing answer for those cynical men who say that a democracy cannot be honest and efficient."

LEGISLATION which the President said, in his radio talk, should be enacted by congress immediately included the old age and unemployment insurance bill, the NRA extension bill, the public utility holding company bill, the transportation control bill, and the banking bill.

Here he comes into conflict again with the views of business leaders of the country. The National Association of Manufacturers has just issued its economic analysis of conditions, which says recovery is "within our grasp" and that the nation is closer to breaking the back of the depression than at any time for years, but asks that, in order to stimulate business, the administration and congress temporarily shelve as "disturbing" such legislation as unemployment insurance, the omnibus banking bill, the utility holding company bill, the 30-hour work week, the Wagner labor disputes bill, the Guffey bituminous coal measure and proposed changes in railroad laws.

Of tied-up capital, the analysis said this:

"Surveys indicate that close to $20,000,000,000 in expenditures, which would give employment to 4,000,000 men for two years, is pent up in the field of factory expansion, renovation and rehabilitation alone.

"The release of this flow of private capital by removing political uncertainties would dwarf the billions appropriated by congress for relief and make unnecessary the expenditure of much of the taxpayers' money."

This document was given out as the members of the United States Chamber of Commerce were gathering in Washington for their twenty-third annual convention, and naturally their speakers endorsed it and attacked much of the proposed legislation mentioned as unwarranted intrusion of the government into business.

Henry I. Harriman, who has been president of the organization for three years, retired from that office in favor of Harper Sibley of Rochester, N. Y. The new president is a banker and a farmer on a big scale.

HOW the New Dealers propose to redistribute wealth by double taxation of large estates is revealed by Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau in a letter to Senator Pat Harrison, chairman of the senate finance committee. Mr. Morgenthau outlines a plan of imposing inheritance taxes and also retaining the existing estate taxes, asserting this is in line with "our fundamental objectives." That this would result in the dissolution of large properties, the secretary recognizes, for he says:

"To prevent the necessity of hasty liquidation of large properties in order to pay the tax, it might be provided that inheritance taxes be payable in a convenient number of installments."

Secretary Morgenthau

The plan as outlined by Mr. Morgenthau is to impose graduated inheritance taxes on estates, with rates following those of the present income tax rates, which approximate 60 per cent on incomes of a million dollars or more. The present estate taxes have a maximum of 60 per cent over ten million dollars.

Thus there would first be a tax of 60 per cent upon the estate or gift, and then another tax of 60 per cent to be paid by those inheriting or receiving it. This would amount to a combined rate of 85 per cent on an estate of one hundred million dollars.

If all this money were handed out to the poorer people, even Huey Long might be satisfied.

PLANS for spending the $4,880,000,000 work relief fund are being made rapidly, parts of the general scheme being revealed to the public almost every day. The President will be the final arbiter but practically all the federal agencies will participate and three new ones have been announced by Mr. Roosevelt. These will handle rural rehabilitation, rural electrification and grade crossing elimination.

Frank Walker

Standing at the President's right hand is Frank C. Walker, former treasurer of the Democratic party. He has replaced Donald Richberg as chairman of the National Emergency council and is the head of a new division in that body known as the division of application and information. Under his direction all proposals will be sorted out and data on them from various government units will be co-ordinated. Then they will be handed on, with Mr. Walker's recommendations, to a new works allotment board which is headed by Secretary Harold Ickes. These two additions to the alphabet groups in Washington are known as DAI and WAB.

Mr. Roosevelt also announced the appointment of Federal Relief Administrator Harry L. Hopkins as chief of a works progress division. He will pick workers, fix wages, purchase materials and generally supervise projects.

In a press conference the President named these eight types of work which will be undertaken, with the amount of money to be spent on each:

1. Highways, roads, streets, grade crossing elimination, and express highways, $800,000,000.
2. Rural rehabilitation, relief in stricken agricultural areas, water conservation, water diversion, irrigation, reclamation, rural industrial communities, and subsistence homesteads, $500,000,000.
3. Rural electrification, $100,000,000.
4. Housing, low cost housing in rural and urban areas, reconditioning, and remodeling, $450,000,000.
5. Assistance for educational, professional, and clerical persons and other "white collar" unemployed, $300,000,000.
6. Citizen Conservation corups, $600,000,000.
7. Sanitation, soil erosion, stream pollution, reforestation, flood control, rivers and harbors, $350,000,000.
8. Loans, grants, or both, to cities, counties, states, and other political subdivisions for public works, $900,000,000.

The rural rehabilitation work will be directed by Rexford G. Tugwell, under-secretary of agriculture, and he will not be responsible to Secretary Wallace but will have a free hand to carry out his schemes for moving families from marginal lands, shifting stranded rural communities and building cities outside of large urban centers to relieve slum congestion.

Appointment of Mr. Walker leaves Mr. Richberg free, as the President said, to devote his time to the NRA during the period of pending legislation in congress and litigation in the Supreme court.

HAVING listened to Senator Long of Louisiana and other orators who do not like the administration and its New Deal and also have little love for the G. O. P., the National Farmers' Holiday association, in session at Des Moines, Iowa, decided that a third national political party should be formed.

Milo Reno, national president of the association, had a lively encounter with a group of alleged Communists during a business session. They sought adoption of a resolution calling for legislation for "relief without debts," "production credit without strings," and immediate repeal of the AAA. Reno denounced them as Wall Street racketeers and henchmen of Soviet Russia.

Milo Reno

"You can't talk. You can't argue. Don't try to get the floor. I'm running this meeting," Reno said. "Sit down and shut up. Get out before we get really mad."

REPUBLICANS of nine midwestern states who met at Excelsior Springs, Mo., decided that the "grass roots" conference of leaders of the party should be held in Springfield, Ill., the date to be fixed later, though it probably will be early in June. The purpose of this gathering will be the rejuvenation of the party and the launching of a campaign to restore popular government. The nine states participating, which will name delegates, are Illinois, Iowa, Indiana, Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska, Missouri, Wisconsin and Oklahoma.

CHECK EROSION, TO SAVE MONEY

Preservation of Soil Means Lower Taxes.

A taxpaying farmer saves twice when he controls erosion. He saves his basic capital, the soil. And he—and his neighbors also—save as taxpayers, says H. S. Riesbol, United States Department of Agriculture engineer.

When rain falls on a farm the water is an individual farm problem as long as it stays on that farm. The farmer may contrive to save it for his crops or he may let it rob him of his soil by sheet erosion or cut his farm land to pieces by gullying.

But when the water leaves the farm it begins to boost taxes for public works. When a farmer controls erosion, whether by terracing, by planting cover crops, or by strip cropping, he reduces both the quantity of water and the sediment that enters the streams. Also the water that escapes does so at a less rapid rate. Small streams do not flood so quickly or rise so high if the watershed is protected from erosion. Culverts and bridges, then, says Riesbol, need not be so large and expensive. If erosion is controlled, the streams are not so muddy and there is less expense in making water fit for municipal water supply or for irrigation. Reservoirs, often expensive structures, do not fill with silt so quickly.

Erosion control, Mr. Riesbol says, is still too new to have had much effect in making possible many notable economies in public works. Individual farmers have protected their fields, but it is only in the year or two that there have been organized demonstrations of what erosion control can do when applied to all or most of the land in a small watershed. This is the type of work, says Mr. Riesbol, which the civil engineers need to watch and study so that they will be ready to take advantage of the economies that will be possible as a result of checking the run-off of water and the waste of soil.

Safetygrams

The Safety Man

Senseless machines never cause an accident. It requires some loose "nuts" behind the steering wheel to provide the cause of all the trouble. An automobile was never known to have left the curb of its own accord to kill somebody or cause an accident.

Drive safely, consistent with traffic conditions. If a man doesn't get a thrill out of a safe driving record, then safe driving is too big a job for him or he is not big enough for the job.

Some people get the impression that an automobile is made only to develop speed regardless of conditions. Automobiles were built for transportation and not as a means to injure or kill people. As a means of transportation, we should appreciate the economic value and not violate the common laws of decency and courtesy.

Chain Letter Business Dead

The "Give A Dime" chain letter business has been going on high here the past week. Everybody reports getting from one to a dozen letters asking for quarters, dimes and dollars. It seems now as if the fad is going to die out of its own accord.

Theo. Ness, Ralph Ness, Hans Ness. Olaf Ness, John Ness, Mrs. Oscar Moline and Mrs. Gust Williams motored to Crookston on Sunday afternoon to buy a tombstone for the grave of their parents, Mr. and Mrs. T. J. Ness, who passed away here last summer.

The fish will have a heck of a time on Sunday when the boys all go out to chase them around in the rivers and lakes. There will be a large delegation going from here to Wheelers Point at Lake of the Woods according to word received at our office.

Organize Windbreak Project

The replacement of the farm windbreaks, seriously depleted during recent years by old age, drouth, insect attacks, hit-or-miss burning and over-grazing, is one of the most important tasks confronting Marshall county farmers and landowners, says the county agent.

Not only should dead trees be replaced with live ones, Mr. Reierson says, but old trees which have only a few years longer to live should also be underplanted with young trees, preferably of long-lived species. If no such measures are taken, he adds, this district may soon be as treeless as the prairies to the westward.

For some time it has been rumored that the state and federal rehabilitation divisions would distribute free trees to farmers for planting. Apparently these reports have no foundation, however, for so far no free trees have been distributed by these agencies in Minnesota.

However, if necessary, farmers can transplant native seedlings to their windbreaks from the neighboring forests, Mr. Reierson points out, or they can grow their own planting stock from the seeds and cuttings of forest trees. On many farms, the windbreaks will reestablish themselves by natural process, if protected from fire and livestock.

Many Marshall county farmers and land owners have inquired recenttly for information about windbreak planting. Mr. Reierson says. The insurance companies and State Rural Credit Department are especially interested and have agreed to cooperate with their tenants in the planting of farm sheltering.

Because of this county-wide interest, the Marshall county agricultural extension service will soon set up a five year windbreak project. Every farmer and land owner in the county will have a chance to enroll. Full details of this project will be explained soon in a series of meetings to be held in every township and trade center of the county. Watch for announcements of these later.

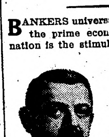
BANKERS SUPPORT SOUND EXPANSION

By R. S. HECHT
Vice President, American Bankers Association



R. S. HECHT

BANKERS universally recognize that the prime economic need of the nation is the stimulation of sound industrial and commercial activities and recent travels over a wide stretch of the country have shown me that they everywhere are making all effort possible to lend constructive financial support within the scope of their proper banking functions to promoting the expansion of business activity.

Frequently in times past when our country suffered from an economic depression and consequent unemployment on a large scale, the rise of some broad new industrial development, such for instance as a new industry like the automobile industry, has been a powerful factor in stimulating a return or an accelerated growth of national prosperity. Such a movement means the creation of new wealth, the employment of large groups of people on useful lines and as a consequence the production and distribution of sound, effective purchasing power, which is a form of wholesome economic stimulant that has none of the evils of monetary inflation.

A New Force for Business Improvement

Perhaps we have at hand, if not the rising of a wholly new industry, a measurable equivalent in the potentialities of a widespread rebuilding and modernizing movement such as home renovising, plant remodeling, the putting of our railroads on a high speed air conditioned basis and other valuable developments in the construction field. The effects of such activities on employment and many lines of business would be most beneficial and I can repeat without reservation that we bankers are willing and eager to play our full economic part in any such constructive developments.

It has been made to appear that money has not gone to work because of the timidity of bankers rather than what is a true explanation, because business men have not had enough confidence in the business outlook to borrow the dollar from the banker and put it to work.

The basic requisite to the expansion of commercial bank loans is sound, normal business conditions on which to conduct sound, normal banking operations. The best business a bank can wish for is the opportunity to loan money to successful business men and manufacturers imbued with confidence to enter upon aggressive business enterprises and endowed with the ability to bring them to successful conclusions. Such loans mean business activity for the community, growing pay rolls and prosperity, and the banker wants to make them because to be identified with such activities not only means profits to him but, additionally, brings him the reward of good will in his community.

There is no better proof of the great desire of banks to take care of the short term requirements of the business world than to point out the abnormally low rates at which this demand is being supplied at the present time.

Resigned As Bookkeeper

In our issue of the News for May 17 we run a news item stating that Mr. T. B. Folden had resigned as secretary of the Farmers' Cooperative Creamery Company here at Holt and that Walter Larson had taken over that work. Mr. Folden has since informed us that he did not resingn as secretary but that he did resign the job of bookeeping and treasurer.

Mr. Folden is still the active secretary of the creamery board as well as a director. Mr. Larson is the manager, bookkeeper and treasurer of the local creamery.

Creameries Picnic June 9

Tentative plans for the eighth annual picnic of the Marshall County Creameries association picnic to be held at the Old Mill Site picnic grounds on Sunday, June 9, were formed at a meeting of creamery representatives at Newfolden Saturday night, G. A. Sustad, Viking, secretary, announced.

Invitations have been extended to creameries in adjoining counties to join the Marshall county association for the annual picnic and if present plans go through and weather conditions are favorable, the largest crowd to ever assemble on the grounds will be present at the 1935 event, said Mr. Sustad.

The indications are that all of the creameries of Marshall and Kittson counties will join the association, the Kittson county creameries including Lancaster, Karlstad, Halma, Bronson, Strathcona an Hallock. Four Town in Beltrami county and Goodridge in Pennington county may also join and there is a possibility that all creameries in Pennington county will take part.

Officers of the Marshall County Creameries association chosen at the Newfolden meeting include E. M. Evans of Middle River, president; E. O. Hjelle, Newfolden, vice president and Mr. Sustad, secretary-treasurer.

Committees appointment are as follows:

Program—E. M. Evans, chairman; G. A. Sustad, Martin Saugen, Stuart McLeod and the new fieldman to be chosen for the 17th Land O'Lakes Creameries district.

Grounds—E. O. Hjelle, chairman; Henry Anderson and Egan Dunham.

Sports—Walter Larson, chairman; Carl Lindberg, Hjalmer Martin and Walter Peterson.

All committees will meet at the Newfolden Creamery on May 25 to make final arrangements for the county's biggest annual picnic. The program committee is already contacting speakers for the event and will make announcements at a later date.—Warren Sheaf.

Crow and Gopher Hunt

The gopher and crow hunt was on in a hot way on Sunday with practically every man that had a gun being out to pop away at them. You had better step on it lively from now on if you want to taste that good Turkey dinner that Newfolden will give you if you win.

Mrs. A. E. Anderson Called

Mrs. A. E. Anderson, long time resident of this village passed away last Friday just before noon at the home of her daughter, Mrs. C. L. Sandberg, after an illness that had kept her in bed most of the time the past winter.

Mrs. Anderson was born on June 15, 1843 in Sweden and was at the time of her death 91 years eleven months and two days old.

She came to America with her husband and children in 1880 and settled in Chicago. There they spent three years, later moving to the Black River township in Pennington county. After only a short time there Mr. Larson, her first husband, passed away. She was later married to Mr. Anderson who passed away about twenty years ago. At that time she came to Holt and had a small home built here and where she lived since.

Funeral services were conducted from the Swedish Lutheran Church in the Black River community on Tuesday afternoon with Rev. Redal officiating in the English language and Rev. Larson of St. Hilaire officiating in the Swedish language.

She leaves to mourn her passing three sons, Emil, Thomas and Richard of St. Hilaire, two daughters, Mrs. C. L. Sandberg of Holt and Mrs. John Scholin of St. Hilaire, 23 grand children and 20 great grand children.

The Carlson Funeral Service had charge of all arrangements.

Many neighbors and friends from here attended the funeral.

Card of Thanks

We hereby express our thanks to our friends and neighbors for their kindness and sympathy shown us during the illness and death of our mother and grandmother. Especially do we thank Rev. Redal for his words of comfort and those who sang at the funeral.

Retest For Bangs Disease

Drs. H. M. Rolighed and B. M. Bolstad will start retesting herds of cattle in which Bangs disease was found during the test conducted last winter. The same benefit payments will be made on any reactors which may be found in these herds.

Application may also be made by other farmers who desire to have their herds tested by calling or writing the County agent office at Warren and signing agreements to have their herds tested.

Under the Bangs teat the government agrees to pay benefit payments up to $20.00 for each reactor depending on the difference between the appraisal and the net salvage which a farmer receives for a reactor when disposed of on the livestock market.

Farmers who wish to sign up for this test should do so at once.

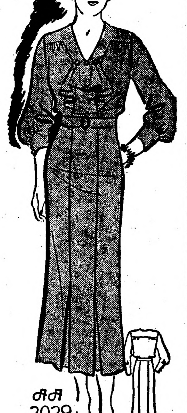
TYPE OF DRESS ALWAYS CORRECT

PATTERN 2029



Here is a dress with real character. Its nice simple lines are made interesting by an original jabot, cut in one with the soft shoulders. Gathers relieve any tendency toward severity while vertical seams, released into pleats below the knees, define the skirt and give an illusion of slenderness. It's the type of dress you can wear and wear—every place. So, for a smart spring season, select a matelasse crepe—or one with definite surface interest, of which the shops are full—and choose a lovely new color. Gray and greige are important now, as are navy blues and shades of brown. Sleeves may be made long.

Pattern 2029 is available in sizes 16, 18, 20, 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46. Size 36 takes 4⅛ yards 39-inch fabric. Illustrated step-by-step sewing instructions included.

SEND FIFTEEN CENTS (15c) in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for this pattern. Write plainly name, address, and style number. BE SURE TO STATE SIZE.

Address orders to Sewing Circle Pattern Department, 243 West Seventeenth street, New York City.

CURRENT EVENTS PASS IN REVIEW

PEEK THINKS UNITED STATES NO LONGER IS THE BIG CREDITOR NATION.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD
© Western Newspaper Union.

GEORGE N. PEEK, in his capacity of advisor to the President on foreign trade, has just made public statistics that tend to show the United States is losing its position as the world's chief creditor nation, and makes recommendations that are in accord with the growing trend against internationalism in the administration and in conflict with Secretary Hull's program of removing barriers to international trade by reciprocal trade agreements.

George N. Peek

Stating that whether or not this country still owes less to other nations than they owe to it appears to depend on the true value of defaulted war debts, Mr. Peek recommends these immediate steps:

"1. The inauguration of a detailed study of our direct investments abroad and foreigners' direct investments in the United States, to supplement the studies now in progress of capital movements.

"2. A review of all national policies based in whole or in part upon our international creditor status."

The proposal seems to lead toward high tariffs and a policy of allocating our foreign trade among other nations, as is done by many of the European countries.

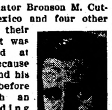
Figures compiled by Mr. Peek indicate that the United States is a net international creditor by $16,897,000,000, but this includes $10,304,000,000 principal amount of war debts owed by foreign governments, and also foreign bonds held by private investors in the United States invoiced at their face value, and a pre-depression estimate of the value of American branch factories abroad and other direct investments in foreign countries. Mr. Peek strongly infers that a re-estimation of these "assets" will result in such a scaling down that this country will no longer be a creditor nation and need not act as such.

By his recommendation for a review of all our national policies based in whole or in part on our international credit status, Mr. Peek unquestionably means that there will be no further validity to the argument that as a creditor nation we must open our markets to imported goods, and that imports need be only sufficient to balance current exports, taking into consideration such invisible items of international trade as shipping services and tourist expenditures.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT strongly resented the criticism of his New Deal policies by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, and retorted by calling to the White House Secretary Roper's business planning and advisory council for an endorsement of NRA extension and the social securities program. Then to the newspaper correspondents Mr. Roosevelt scored the action of the chamber, asserting that in too many cases so-called business organizations misrepresent the business men for whom they claim to speak, and that he did not believe a single speech made at the chamber's meeting contained any mention of the human side of the picture. He declared the business organizations were not indicative of the mass belief and that he would go along with the great bulk of the people.

Several members of the business advisory council were also members of the Chamber of Commerce, and it is said they resented the President's action in seemingly using them to offset the attack by the chamber. Some of them were on the point of resigning from the Roper council, but were placated by Mr. Roosevelt who assured them their views were highly valued.

IN THE crash of a transport plane of Transcontinental Western Air near Atlanta, Mo., Senator Bronson M. Cutting of New Mexico and four other persons fell to their death. The pilot was unable to land at Kansas City because of a dense fog and his fuel gave out before he could reach an emergency landing field at Kirksville. Besides Mr. Cutting those killed were Miss Jeanne A. Hillias of Kansas City, Mrs. William Kaplan of West Los Angeles, and Harvey Bolton and K. H. Greeson, pilots, both of Kansas City. Eight passengers were seriously injured.



Senator Cutting

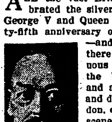
Bronson Cutting, a millionaire of an aristocratic family, was a radical Republican and was one of the outstanding members of the senate. He supported Mr. Roosevelt for President in 1932, but when he came up for reelection last fall he was not given the endorsement of the administration. His victory was contested by Dennis Chavez and the case is still before the senate elections committee. Mr. Cutting was born on Long Island in 1888, graduated from Harvard and thereafter went to New Mexico. In the World war he was an infantry captain and assistant military attache at the American embassy in London. He was appointed to the senate in 1927 to fill a vacancy and was elected next year to a six year term.

The senate on being advised of the tragedy adjourned out of respect to the memory of Senator Cutting, and the house cut short its session.

AFFIRMING a decision of the Supreme court of the District of Columbia, the United States Supreme court held unconstitutional the railroad retirement act, ruling that many of its provisions are invalid. The act provided for a system of old age pensions for all railroad workers. The decision was read by Justice Owen J. Roberts. It condemned many provisions of the law as "arbitrary," placing an undue burden on the railroads and having no relation to safety and efficiency in the operation of the railways.

The act was passed by the Seventy-fourth congress just before it closed, and had the tacit approval of the new administration, although President Roosevelt said he believed it would have to be perfected by amendment. It set up a compulsory pension plan, requiring contributions by both the carriers and the benefited employees. The District of Columbia courts held that the law went too far when it included intrastate as well as interstate employees and when it gave workers retirement credit for the time they had spent in the service prior to passage of the act.

ALL the vast British empire celebrated the silver jubilee of King George V and Queen Mary—the twenty-fifth anniversary of their accession—and for three months there will be a continuous series of fetes in the United Kingdom and all the dominions and dependencies. London, of course, was the scene of the chief celebration on the opening day, and the metropolis was thronged with visitors. Hotels and rooming houses were overcrowded and the king ordered that Hyde Park be kept open so some of the overflow thousands could sleep there.



King George

There were seven state processions the first day. The first was that of the speaker of the house of commons, Capt. Edward A. Fitzgerald, with five ancient gilded coaches; the second, that of Prime Minister Ramsay MacDonald, with six coaches in which rode the dominion prime ministers. Then came a two-coach procession of Lord High Chancellor Sankey, and one of the lord mayor of London, Sir Stephen Killik. The fifth procession was that of the duke of York, from Buckingham palace, two carriages with a captain's escort of the magnificently appareled royal horse guards.

The prince of Wales, as heir to the throne, came sixth. He had with him a captain's escort of the Life Guards and two carriages, in the first of which he rode with Queen Maud of Norway and his brother, the duke of Gloucester, like him, a bachelor.

Finally, in the most gorgeous parade of all, came George and Mary, and as their ornate coach, drawn by the famous grays, passed, the voices of all loyal Britishers rose in a roar of "God bless the king and queen." The rulers, accompanied by all the other notables, went to St. Paul's cathedral to give public thanks to God.

DISREGARDING the wishes of President Roosevelt, the finance committee of the senate adopted and reported for passage a simple resolution continuing the national recovery act until April 1, 1936, and at the same time making these provisions:

1. No price fixing shall be permitted or sanctioned in codes, except in those relating to mineral or natural resources which now have price fixing provisions.

2. No trade engaged in intrastate commerce shall be eligible for a code.

3. The President is given specified time in which to review present codes to carry out the conditions laid down in the first two exceptions to the resolution.

Donald Richberg

Both President Roosevelt and Donald Richberg, head of the NRA, had urged the passage of a new two-year NRA bill which would set up a stricter dictatorship over business and industry. The senate finance committee, however, would not consent to this and instead passed the resolution, which was drawn up by Senator Clark of Missouri and approved by Chairman Pat Harrison. Twelve senators first called at the White House and the President seemed willing to accept the continuing resolution until Mr. Richberg came in and protested urgently; whereupon Mr. Roosevelt turned it down. The committee then took the action noted by a vote of 16 to 3, defying both the President and Richberg.

BAHIA, third city of the republic of Brazil, was overwhelmed by furious storms and torrential rains, and the destruction was extended to all the surrounding country. Communications were demoralized, but fragmentary reports told of terrible scenes of death and devastation. It was believed that at least 400 lives were lost and probably 2,000 persons rendered homeless. Rescue and relief work was being carried on as well as possible by hundreds of soldiers and the government agencies.

TWO thousand young Catholics of Germany made an Easter pilgrimage to Rome, and on their return home they were treated as political suspects, stripped of their mementoes and held for a time in a concentration camp. Addressing another group of Pilgrims from Germany, Pope Pius made a strong protest against this action of the Nazis who, he said, "wish in the name of so-called positive Christianity to de-Christianize Germany, and they wish to conduct the country back to barbaric paganism, and nothing is left undone to disturb Christian and Catholic life."

THE senate committee named to devise a means of curbing such attacks on the President as are frequently made by Huey Long on the floor of the senate has not yet reported, but it is said Senator Bennett Champ Clark of Missouri has figured out how it can be done. Clark is the upper chamber's chief expert on parliamentary procedure and for four years he was parliamentarian of the lower house. His plan is to rewrite rule 19 of the senate rules to include the President and so protect him from unwarranted attacks and slanders. That rule reads at present:

Senator B. C. Clark

"No senator in debate shall, directly or indirectly, by any form of words impute to another senator or to other senators any conduct or motive unworthy or unbecoming a senator."

One of Long's favorite ways of launching his diatribes is to rise to a question of personal privilege, and Clark proposes that in this respect the senate rules be changed to conform with those of the house. In that body when a member feels he has been aggrieved he must explain exactly how he has been injured before he is permitted to speak. The speaker decides whether or not his injury is justified.

Senator Glass of Virginia has failed at various times to silence the "Kingfish" and he, too, has a plan he thinks might help accomplish that end. He recommends a requirement that all amendments offered to an appropriation bill be germane. Such a requirement would affect other senators, but Glass' move admittedly is directed against Long.

YUGOSLAVIA'S dictatorship will be continued and enlarged, for Premier Yevtitch's government party won a sweeping victory at the polls; this, despite the fact that the small towns and villages of Croatia gave an overwhelming vote for the opposition leader, Dr. Vladimir Matchek.

IN THE name of 400,000 Knights of Columbus, Martin H. Carmody, supreme knight of the order, has sent to President Roosevelt a letter urging American diplomatic intervention on behalf of Catholics in Mexico. The matter has been up in congress at various times but quite naturally the administration is hesitant about interfering in what Mexico considers a domestic affair.

SECRETARY ICKES' Department of the Interior has now been elevated to the level of the State, Treasury and Agriculture departments, for congress has granted one of Harold's dearest wishes and given him an undersecretary, whose salary is to be $10,000 a year. This was a senate amendment to the Interior department appropriation bill, and was accepted by the house, 243 to 92, only after considerable pressure had been applied by the administration. Many of the house Democrats have asserted that Mr. Ickes snubbed them, and they would have liked nothing better than to administer a rebuke to him by defeating the amendment, but the party leaders drove them into line.

POLICE of Havana apparently are well on the way to solution of the mystery of the fire which destroyed the Ward liner Morro Castle, and other recent marine disasters. They have arrested three men, all natives of Catalan province in Spain, and say that they found on their persons letters of instructions concerning the destruction of the steamship Magallanes of the Spanish line, which was soon due in Havana. The documents, according to the authorities, ordered the accused to "take necessary action to precipitate a disaster similar to that of the Morro Castle." The police say the prisoners are well-known anarchists.

FOREIGN MINISTER PIERRE LAVAL of France and Ambassador Potemkin of Russia finally fixed up the mutual assistance pact between the two countries in a way acceptable to both and it was signed in Paris. M. Laval then prepared to leave for Moscow, planning to stop in Warsaw en route.

It would seem that Laval had his way with the treaty, for it subordinates military action of the two powers to the procedure of the League of Nations, to provisions of the Locarno pact and also to the Franco-Polish alliance.

ARIZONA'S victory over the government in the Parker dam case ruled on by the Supreme court alarmed the New Dealers for the safety of some of their other big projects of the same nature. The court decided that Secretary Ickes, as public works administrator, was without authority to dam navigable rivers unless specifically ordered by congress and that the law creating the PWA had not listed any such specific projects as the Parker dam.

Marshall—A regional safety conference sponsored by the Minnesota Public Safety committee was held here with more than 300 delegates attending.

Minneapolis—The farm implement business in the northwest is experiencing the biggest boom since 1929, leading one to believe that crops will be bouteous this season.

Sibbings—Two CCC workers, guarding lakes and streams north of here against spearing and dynamiting of fish, were attacked and beaten into insensibility by a band of poachers.

Appleton—Mrs. Karl Husebo, believed to have been the oldest resident in this section of the state, died at the home of her daughter, Mrs. R. Hauglum. She was 102 years old.

Minneapolis—An agent of the Hannon detective agency, mistaken for a prowler was shot and killed by Valentine Murtele, 101 Mt. Curve avenue, president of the Minnesota Linseed Oil Co.

Minneapolis—Healthy condition of Minnesota's 478 state, savings and trust banks is reflected in the bank call of April 18, which showed an increase of $12,392,000 in deposits over December 31.

Chatfield—For sixty years Mr. and Mrs. John Shoda have operated a 40-acre farm near here. And all these years they have used a horse and buggy to make the 6-mile trip to town. Mr. Shoda is 84 and his wife 76.

Worthington—A horse dragged Floyd Larson, 15-year-old farm boy to his death. He went to the pasture to get the animal and tied the halter rope about his ram. The horse evidently became frightened and ran away.

Two Harbors—Pleading guilty to a charge of strangling her newborn babe, Grace Monahan, 19 years old, was entenced to serve one year and one month in the womans' reformatory of Shakopee by District Judge H. J. Granais.

Minneapolis—As soon as the Minneapolis Gas Light Co. is able to turn mixed gas into its mains Minneapolis gas consumers will receive the benefit of approximately $80,000 in excess gas company net earnings, which will be returned to them.

Red Wing—A river tugboat isn't the speediest means of transportation, but it made a six-mile run upstream to Red Wing quickly enough to bring the ship's cook, an appendicitis victim to a local hospital in time for an emergency operation.

Minneapolis—A year ago this month the worst dust storm in the state's history swept Minnesota, with hot and dry temperatures hitting all-time highs. Quite a difference from May, this year, when the temperatures rarely have risen over 65 degrees.

St. Paul—Petition of railroads operating in the state for permission to apply the new inter-state freight rates to intra-state traffic was denied by the railroad and warehouse commission. The commission held that to apply the rate on an intra-state basis would be discriminatory against northwest shippers, and would tend to stimulate more serious trucking competition.

St. Paul—There are more than 50 millionaires in Minnesota, an analysis of the 1934 income tax returns made by A. R. Knox, acting collector of internal revenue, show. Although the exact number is unknown, returns showed 177 individuals have paid or will pay income taxes in excess of $4000 for a total of $2,034,615, or approximately 42 per cent of the entire individual income tax assessments in the state.

St. Paul—Illegality of the old age pension law passed by the 1935 legislature was established so conclusively in an opinion by Attorney General Hary H. Peterson, submitted to the state board of control, that Senator B. G. Novak of St. Paul, sponsor of the measure, decided a test case would be only a futile gesture. The attorney general pointed out that legislative clerks inadvertently had failed to remove from the bill two amendments which had been stricken out by the legislature. As a result, the enrolled bill which was presented to the governor for his signature was not the bill which was passed by the legislature.

Minneapolis—Plans for definite increase in the Civilian conservation corps are now moving forward and reliable information indicates that one new veterans company will be assigned to Minnesota, which would bring veteran enrollment to a total strength of approximately 1,250 men. Application from veterans will be received by the veterans administration at Minneapolis at any time, and it is important that all veterans who desire consideration for this work make application to the veterans administration as soon as possible.

SYNOPSIS

Theodore Gatlin adopts a baby, "Penelope," in an effort to solve his matrimonial troubles. But his wife has never wanted her, and their affairs end in the divorce court. At a baseball game a ball strikes ten-year-old Penelope on the nose. Mrs. Gatlin spirits the child to Europe. Gatlin wills Penelope all his money, and is about to begin a search for her when a motor accident ends his life. Some ten years later, in San Francisco, Stephen Burt, rising young psychiatrist, is presented by Dan McNamara, chief of police, with a new patient—Nance Belden, a girl with a dual personality, for which her "saddle nose" is in part responsible. McNamara does not think she is a criminal and obtains Burt's testimony in court. Lanny, the doctor's office nurse, is also won over. Nance's criminal record outweighs Doctor Burt's explanation of her case and she is sent to San Quentin penitentiary. Nance escapes, although shot, and goes to Lanny's apartment, from which, by McNamara's orders, she is removed to the chief's home. From one of the men in the boat on which the girl escaped McNamara learns that Nance's real name is Penelope Gatlin. He also discovers that she is heiress to $750,000. Fearful of McNamara, in his official capacity, Nance flees. Lanny finds her in her apartment, sound asleep. Several days later her partially restored memory leads her to tell Lanny of her wealthy father, Theodore Gatlin, and of her girlhood in France.

"We've been like two pups, chasing our tails," Angelloti complained when they met at their car. "The chief's up to his old tricks, babying a convict with the con, and that's the bird Doctor Burt is calling to treat."

"The girl's been there, just the same, Amadeo, my boy. There was a lipstick on the bureau and that's something old lady McNamara don't use. And I found a roll of adhesive, the heel of a roll of bandage and a soiled sheet with some bloodstains on it in the dirty clothes basket in the bathroom."

Angelloti was convinced. "Where did she go?"

"She might have doubled back to that old nurse's house again, but I doubt that, because she knows that's risky."

"Well, let's give Miss Lanning's house a prowl, anyhow."

Flynn was one of those hearty fellows who will try anything twice, so they went immediately to Lanny's house. The lights in front were out when they arrived, so Flynn pussyfooted around to the rear of the cottage to see if any lights were lighted there. Finding none, he listened for possible voices. Hearing none, he cautiously lifted the lid off Lanny's garbage can and bent his flashlight on it. He was rewarded for his courage by finding a stained bandage with clipped adhesive tape clinging to it. This telltale evidence he carried around to Angelloti; they entered their car, drove a block and inspected the clue in the light of the dash lamp. Then they silently shook hands.

"Nothing is ever lost if you know where it is," Flynn rejoiced. "I'm going to get my missus a winter coat with my half of the reward. We'll bone the district attorney for a search warrant tomorrow, and tomorrow night when the old lady gets home, we'll make the pinch."

"Shall we pinch her as an accessory?"

"Amadeo, my boy, unless you're looking hard for something, it's a mistake to see too much or know too much. This Lanning woman is a friend of the chief's. As far as the public ever need know we picked the girl up on the street."

Angelloti nodded his acquiescence; they got the search warrant on the strength of that soiled bandage, and at nine o'clock that night arrived in their car. Flynn went to the back door and posted himself there; and Angelloti rang the front doorbell. A light was switched on in the hall presently, and Lanny, dressed for the street, opened the door six inches. Angelloti had his foot in it in a flash.

"Detective Sergeant Angelloti of the central station, Miss Lanning. I have here a search warrant, giving me legal right to search your house and secure the person of Nance Belden, an escaped convict from San Quentin penitentiary. Read it an' weep!"

"You take your big flat foot out of my door and stay outside until I've read this purported search warrant or I'll shoot your foot off," Lanny informed him coldly. Angelloti withdrew his foot promptly, Lanny closed the door, and he could see her faintly through the curtained glass, reading.

"Come in," she invited—and at that moment the electric light bulb tossed out the upper window by Nance exploded with a loud report. "What's that?" Angelloti cried, instantly alert. A still louder explosion reverberated in the back yard; then the voice of Flynn crying: "Hey, stop, or I'll shoot."

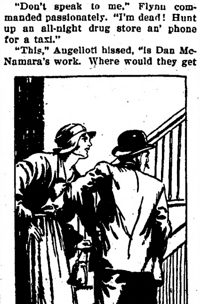
"Tried slippin' her out the back door, eh?" Angelloti exulted, and dashed through the house, with Lanny at his heels. As he went out the kitchen door, Lanny slammed and bolted it behind him, and then, even as Dan McNamara had predicted, nature took her course. Nance dropped the remainder of the bombs and came dashing down the stairs. "Good-by, Lanny, darling," she cried happily. "We'll meet again." Lanny switched off the hall light, and Nance was through the front door and gone. Across the street two coupes stood at the curb, the motors of both turning over slowly.

Alternately the girl's finger was pointed at each car. "My—mother—told—me—to—take — this — one," she murmured, and when, through the aid of this childhood formula, she had made her decision, she leaped into the coupe of Messrs. Flynn and Angelloti and went rapidly away. Lanny, watching her from the darkened doorway, saw that she had taken the wrong car, but was afraid to cry out and warn her. So she did the next best thing. She locked her front door behind her, climbed into the other car and drove down town to a late motion picture show. She carried the search warrant with her and while enjoying the show tore it into little bits.

Of the weeping, the groaning, the burning sensations in the eyelids, the bewilderment, the groping, vomiting, cursing and despair of Messrs. Flynn and Angelloti nothing need be said. Suffice that Angelloti felt his way out of the gassed area and about two minutes after Lanny's departure, stationed himself on her front steps, while the valiant Flynn, dying a thousand deaths, stuck manfully at his post, leaning up against the kitchen door, enduring for duty's sake. Convinced they had Nance Belden cornered, they waited for the night wind to dissipate the gas. Angelloti ceased to weep about half an hour after escaping from the gassed area, but continued to gag for an hour. About ten-thirty he was able to see, so he rang Lanny's bell repeatedly, but received no answer. Then he noticed that their car was missing, so he summoned the martyred Flynn around front and told him the worst.

"Don't speak to me," Flynn commanded passionately. "I'm dead! Hunt up an all-night drug store an' phone for a taxi."

"This," Angelloti hissed, "is Dan McNamara's work. Where would they get the bombs if he didn't swipe 'em out of the police arsenal?"



"What's That?" Angelloti Cried, Instantly Alert.

Flynn commenced to sob as he considered the barren fruits of his enormous sacrifice.

"Amadeo, swear to me, by our common faith, that, come what will, blow high, blow low, come sickness or sorrow, happiness or health, you'll never lay off this job until we've landed that—that—that huzzy."

"Right! I swear." Angelloti's voice trembled with the sincerity of his purpose.

The respective wives of the worthy pair telephoned down to the chief of the detectives next morning and informed him that their husbands were confined to bed with influenza. It might not be amiss, also, to state that Lanny came home in a taxi about twelve-thirty, and finding the front door free of Angelloti, and the neighborhood ozone quite restored to normalcy, retired to her bed and passed almost at once into dreamless and untroubled sleep.

It was not a police car in which Nance had escaped, but the private vehicle of Detective Sergeant Flynn, and its loss troubled him until the car was found, abandoned, out in the Mission, about twenty-four hours later. A glance at the speedometer comforted Flynn. The car had been driven six miles. In company with Angelloti (both now happily recovered from their terrible experience) he drove in the same car from Lanny's house, via the most direct route, to the point where a patrolman had picked up the car; thence via the route followed by the patrolman when he came off duty and drove the car to the central station and reported it. The mileage was six and two-tenths miles!

"She's holed up within a block or two of where she left the car," Flynn decided.

"Not such a cold trail, after all," Angelloti exulted. "We'll just have to patrol the neighborhood in our off moments. I'm sure the girl doesn't know she swiped your car, and that she gave us a clue to follow her."

"If crooks didn't make mistakes and give us the breaks, my boy, you and I wouldn't be where we are," Flynn reminded him. "I think it might be a good idea to interview the druggist in the neighborhood and see if she's been in to buy a new lipstick."

A round of the neighboring drug stores, however, proved barren of a new lead, and as they had other matters claiming their attention, they were forced to abandon the search that day.

Dan McNamara was much too intelligent to make inquiries of the assistant district attorney who had issued the search warrant, but when informed that Flynn and Angelloti were down with flu he called up Lanny at Stephen's office, and received a meticulous report. "You say the girl fled in the car my dicks arrived in?" he queried. "That's terrible. A description of the car must have been broadcast to all outlying police and the surrounding country stations immediately by Flynn and Angelloti, and Nance will be picked up somewhere down state."

"We've done our damnedest," Lanny replied cheerfully. "Angels can do no more. I borrowed the car you left out front. It's in a garage. I'll send you the claim check."

For a week, the chief waited for news of Nance Belden, but no news came through beyond some gossip around the central station that the car had been driven but three miles and then abandoned—for which evidence that the Almighty was still on his side the worthy fellow was grateful.

So Nance was still in the city! McNamara's mind worked so automatically he did not even have to tell himself that, undoubtedly, she had taken sanctuary within a short distance of the spot where she had abandoned Flynn's car, nor did he have to remind himself that Flynn and Angelloti would come to the same conclusion. He had no difficulty in ascertaining the spot where the car had been recovered.

"Folsom street and Sixteenth, eh?" he reflected. "Residential—flat buildings and cheap apartment houses, cheap rooming houses and workingmen's hotels. No, she wouldn't go to one of those. Not what she is—she has class—and she has two hundred dollars in her possession. She's holed up with a friend. What friend? Why, Ella Cates, of course."

He had already secured Ella Cates' address from the banker in San Jose. However, he realized it would not be wise to call upon her and run the risk of having Flynn or Angelloti run across him in the neighborhood or see him entering Ella Cates' house. The obvious thing, therefore, was to cast about for a job in another part of the city and see that both detectives were assigned to it. If he sent them out of the city for a day or two they might suspect his purpose and have some other dick friend of theirs shadow him during their absence.

While he was considering where he could dispose of them, the president of the Security Trust company in San Jose rang up.

"Miss Penelope Gatlin has just been in the bank, Chief," he told McNamara. "She has purchased a letter of credit for ten thousand dollars and has withdrawn in cash the remainder of the funds on deposit to the credit of her checking account, amounting to eleven hundred dollars."

"Is she in the bank now?"

"Yes."

"Have one of your clerks follow her. Give him some expense money—I'll be responsible for its repayment. And when you get his report please telephone me."

At three-thirty the banker telephoned again. "She purchased a ticket to San Francisco on one of the buses leaving here at three-fifteen. She spent two hours shopping."

The buses, McNamara knew, entered the city via Mission street, the bus depot was at Fifth and Mission streets. Ella Cates lived on Howard street, between Fifteenth and Sixteenth. Howard street runs between Mission and Folsom—and Flynn's car had been found abandoned at Sixteenth and Folsom. Nance was smart. She had left the car a block from Ella Cates' home and walked there. McNamara reasoned the incoming bus would drop the girl off at Sixteenth and Mission streets—a regular stop—and she would then make her way to the Cates woman's house.

He glanced at his watch. He had an hour and a half to intercept her; for that hour and a half he must have Flynn and Angelloti in another section of the city. To his annoyance he discovered they were out on a detail, so he decided he would have to risk it, called a taxi and drove to Ella Cates' address. He discovered it to be a cheap wooden apartment house, but the directory in the vestibule gave him no information as to which apartment Ella Cates lived in, so he rang the landlady's bell and the door opened to admit him. To his inquiry regarding Mrs. Cates, he was informed that she had moved to parts unknown a week before, nor could his informant give him any clue to aid him in discovering her.

As he came out of the apartment house he glanced warily around and was amused to observe Detective Angelloti leaning against a cigar stand across the street. He was certain the detective had recognized him, for Angelloti immediately turned his back. The chief walked up to Mission street, boarded a street car and was at the bus terminus two minutes before the bus on which Nance had left San Jose rolled in. But Nance was not among the passengers that alighted.

Ancient Festival Goes On

At Aix en Provence, France, was instituted the first Roman garrison in Gaul. The church of Monte Sainte Victoire perpetuates a victory of Marius. Every April 24 there is a procession from Bauvenargues to the mountain to light a bonfire. This, the festival of Marius, is one of the oldest still existing.

Airplanes Enlisted for War on Locust Hordes

During the past nine years locust swarms have been devastating vast areas in Africa and western Asia, and since 1929 experts have been studying means of controlling the insects. Recently, at an international locust conference held in London, it was resolved that the locusts could be halted through the control of their breeding grounds, or, if they are already in migration, through their destruction in flight.

Agricultural development in Africa has been considerably impeded by the depredations of the locusts, which have caused losses of approximately $35,000,000. Investigations have now disclosed that each species of locust inhabits exclusively a definite zone of vegetation and that its migrations are governed by the seasons. Many of these breeding regions have now been located. The desert locust, for instance, is known to breed in the remote lands south of the Sahara and to migrate northward to the fertile Mediterranean coast of Africa.

Once the breeding areas have been found, the conference reports, the next step in control is to establish field stations where the life habits of the insects will be studied. Evidence already gathered tends to show that swarms form when the life cycles of solitary locusts are accelerated, causing a rapid multiplication of numbers.

As swarms gather preparatory to flight, if their migratory courses have been discovered as well as their breeding sources, it is then possible, recent experiments in Africa indicate, to destroy them with poison dust sprayed from airplanes. Locusts make no effort, it has been shown, to avoid a cloud of sodium arsenate dust blown across their line of flight. Nor does the passage of an airplane through or across their ranks deter them from the course.

Most of the locusts passing through the sodium arsenate eventually drop out of the swarm to their death, apparently because the inhalation of the dust brings on paralysis. The poison will remain fatal to a passing swarm for about three minutes. It must be discharged several times for large swarms and must be sprayed at a height of about 100 feet to avoid damage to crops.

Irish Tower Reproduced

Of that most characteristic type of ancient Irish architecture, the round tower, the only reproduction in America stands in Massachusetts, at Milford. It was built in 1894 by the late Rev. Patrick Cuddahy, a native of Ireland. Interested in Irish antiquities, he studied the towers and obtained descriptive books on the subject. He was his own architect, using the Glendalough tower as a model.

His construction is of Milford granite, coursed ashlar with rubble backing, 72 feet high, with a circumference of 44 feet and internal diameter of 8 feet. The conical roof, formed of layers of dressed stone, and the point, surmounted by the shamrock, are chiseled from one stone. The attic story has four window opes, angular-headed, and one square-headed opening is in each intermediate story. The tower stands like a sentinel in the Catholic cemetery with a lake at its base, as frequently found in Ireland.—New York Times.

Laws Protect Cactus

The cactus has gained such favor for indoor and western garden use that several southwestern states have passed laws to prevent wholesale removal of desert plants.

Safetygrams
BY FRED W. BRAUN
The Safety Man

Who cares about the right-of-way if it will avoid an accident? Why worry about the right-of-way at intersections, cross roads, private driveway, or other road entrance when a few seconds will eliminate the possibility of the smashup. Give the right-of-way to the other fellow and let him be on his way. In another tho seconds you yourself will be on the safe side. That is courteous driving. It is the safest way.

To openly and defiantly drive headlong into an intersection simply because you have the right-of-way is not an act of courtesy nor is it safe driving.

Just ordinary "good manners" in driving an automobile will prevent as many accidents as "reasonable care". The two go hand in hand and are inseparable.

The Volga River.

The Volga river, famed for its boatmen, is as far east as Bagdad, that is, it is on a parallel with this city. Astrakhan is the principal city at its mouth. The river empties into the Caspian sea, which has no outlet to the ocean.

Motorists Lose License

Thus far in 1935 the Drivers License bureau has marked up more than 4,000 traffic convictions and approximately 3,000 accident reports against the records of Minnesota automobile drivers, says a bulletin from the state highway department.

The convictions resulted in more than 400 persons in all parts of the state being deprived of their license to drive. Where law violations were not serious enough to warrant revocation or suspension of license, the cases were recorded on the individual cards kept by the license bureau for all drivers. Should the same drivers be involved in further law violations or accidents, their previous records will be available

"The legislature kept the provisions of the drivers license law in force", commented N. W. Elsberg, highway commissioner. "The drivers license division, with the co-operation of police and sherriffs' forces and highway patrol, will continue to administer and enforce this law to the best of its ability. Such safety measures as this must be kept in force if we are to halt the maiming and slaughter of citizens on the public highways.

"Everyone must have his drivers license when at the wheel of a car, and the license should be in good condition and should bear the owner's correct address."

NATURAL FORCES AID BUSINESS RECOVERY

By R. S. HECHT
President American Bankers Association

R. S. HECHT

ALTHOUGH, as official studies of business conditions show, business is still far from having struck its full stride, nevertheless, I believe that it is undoubtedly true that the natural economical processes which have always brought the nation out of a slump are now and have been for some time steadily at work laying the foundations for more active and normal business conditions.

I believe that there is growing a broader public perception that the people of this country must make their own prosperity and not wait for the Government at Washington to make it for them. In other words, normal economic vigor and vitality of the United States is slowly but inevitably bringing a return of natural business recovery.

The Fundamental Cure

Like a doctor, the administration can help nature. But the fundamental healing processes will come from natural causes and not from political remedies. Despite the slackening of business now apparent, despite expressions of disappointment we hear from various quarters, nevertheless I am confident that these fundamental healing processes, if not spectacular, are none the less surely at work.

Gradually our business leaders are showing greater confidence in the future and are assuming a more forward looking position. I firmly believe that if we will make up our minds to replace fear psychology with confidence-psychology the results will fully justify such a new attitude.

BANKERS' ASSOCIATION STIMULATES ADVERTISING

The American Bankers Association's Advertising Department reports rapid progress of the use by banks of the informative bank newspaper advertising prepared by it for members to assist them in rebuilding public confidence and good will in their communities.

The central theme of this advertising service deals with the "essential line of economic and social service that all sound banking inherently renders the depositor and the public," the report says, showing that "it is not banking laws which make banking useful and safe, but that fundamentally it is honesty and skill in management under private initiative."

The Advertising Department is supplying about a thousand members of the association with newspaper and other advertising material. The newspaper material totals about 50,000 advertisements annually. The growth of the work of the department is shown by the following figures: On September 1, 1934, the number of banks being served regularly each month was 623. The total number on April 1, 1935, was 924, an increase of 301 regular subscribers, or 49 per cent in a period of seven months.

Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Fricker and son, Mr. and Mrs. Sam Lorentson and family, Mrs. Miller, Mr. and Mrs. H. O. Hanson and family from here and Ben Hagglund of Thief River Falls and Mike Fricker of St. Hilaire spent Saturday afternoon and Sunday at McGuires Lodge at Wheeler's Point on Lake of the Woods. They spent most of time enjoying the good fishing there and came home with a good catch.

Mrs. H. O. Hanson, Mrs. A. L. Carlson, Mrs. Hjalmer Peterson, Mrs. C. L. Sandberg, Mrs. O. E. Sovde, Mrs. A. Bennes and daughter Beulah, Mrs. L. M. Redal were entertained at the home of Mrs. E. M. Loven on Tuesday in honor of Miss Minnie Loven.

Band Gave A Fine Concert

A large crowd came to town last Thursday evening to hear the Holt Community Band play. This was the first concert the band has given this year. The organization has worked hard the past few months and have improved their work to a standard where they can now go out and carry the banner with bands from the larger cities.

The band was given many splendid compliments upon the fine program they gave the people here on the opening night. A free will offering was taken up and about ten dollars was received to carry on the good work the organization is doing. Rev. Redal, director, and the executive committee of the band deserve a lot of credit for their work.

Jerome Redal, son of Rev. and Mrs. Redal, had his leg broken when he was bumped by a bicycle on the school grounds here last Thursday forenoon. He was taken to the St. Lukes' hospital where he had the bone set and his leg put in a cast. He returned home on Friday.

In Memoriam

We cannot but halt a moment, as we cross the threshold of the beautiful month of May, in silent honor of those who gave their all that we might prosper and live in a world of happiness and peace. "Their" day comes in May. A single day out of a year of length-yet more hearts, and minds and love, will surrender on Decoration Day than on any other of the year.

The torn hearts of the mothers who lost their "boys" on the battlefields of Europe will rest easier as the Almithy casts his reflection over the world on Decoration Day. The graves of those "boys" will again feel the tears of the loved ones left behind.

No honor is too great for those who laid down their lives in the wars of our nation since its birth. No flowers are beautiful enough to grace the graves of our "Soldier".

It is our prayer, and the prayer of countless others in all parts of the world, that Decoration Day this year will serve to tender the resting places of our great, and ease many heavy hearts.

Suspend NRA Enforcement

According to a story in the big daily papers for Tuesday, the NRA its vast code structure tumbled by a sweeping United States Supreme Court dicision of unconstitutionality, on Monday night suspended "all methods of compulsory enforcement.

The Frazier-Lemke act granting five-year moratorium for paying off farm mortgages and affecting billions of dollars of indebtedness was also held unconstitutional by the supreme court.

$200,000 Kidnaping

Another $200,000 kidnaping has been pulled off. This time it was the stealing of 9 year old George Weyerhaeuser son of Mr. and Mrs. J. P. Weyerhaeuser of Tacoma, Washington. The boy was kidnaped last Friday as he was going home from school.

According to the daily papers the kidnapers had planned the job a long time and that they claim that they have studied it out so well that there is no possible chance for them to be caught like the other kidnaping rings have. They demand that they pay $200,000 under certain rules before the boy is returned.

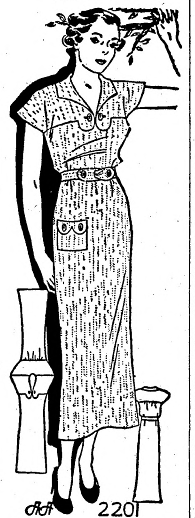
ATTRACTIVE IN ITS SIMPLICITY

PATTERN 2201



Here is a frock to make those numerous home chores pleasurable. Its nice simplicity applies not only to its making—which is easy in the extreme, as denoted by the sketch of the garment spread open—but also to the laundering problem. A run of the iron and it is again fresh and immaculate, doing its bit graciously to keep you in trim. Its lovely, freedom-giving design lends itself well to the new cottons in stripes, plaids, checks or floral prints—so well, in fact, that you'll likely repeat the pattern in many fabrics. The smart yoke which includes the sleeve effect is decidedly becoming.

Pattern 2201 is available in sizes 12, 14, 16, 18, 20, 30, 32, 34, 36, 38, 40 and 42. Size 36 takes 3⅛ yards 35 inch fabric. Illustrated step-by-step sewing instructions included.

SEND FIFTEEN CENTS (15c) in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for this pattern. Write plainly name, address, and style number. BE SURE TO STATE SIZE.

Address orders to Sewing Circle Pattern Department, 243 West Seventeenth street, New York City.

PILSUDSKI'S DEATH WORRIES STATESMEN OF EUROPE—FLEET MANEUVERS.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

©. Western Newspaper Union.

COMPLICATIONS in the already precarious European situation were expected to result from the death of Marshal Josef Pilsudski, the virtual dictator of Poland. The "father of his country" succumbed to cancer of the stomach in Warsaw and his death was a great shock to the Poles for the serious nature of his affliction had been concealed from the public. The marshal's heart was interred at Vilna and his brain was given to science, according to his request; but his body was buried in the cathedral of Rawel castle at Crakow beside those of King John Sobieski, Thaddeus Kosciuszko and others of Poland's great men.

Pilsudski held only the office of minister of war, but was the real ruler of Poland, and there was anxious speculation as to his successor. Some observers thought this might be Col. Josef Beck, the foreign minister, who was especially close to the marshal. Other candidates were Alexander Prystor, former premier, and the present premier, Col. Walery Slawek.

The iron-willed marshal had been a consistent advocate of a close rapprochement between Poland and Germany, sternly curbing the activities of those who favored the course of breaking away from the reich and standing with France in her policies for eastern Europe. Pilsudski was rather offended by the recently signed pact between France and Russia, and French Foreign Minister Laval stopped in Warsaw on his way to Moscow to try to pacify him; but the marshal was too ill to take part in the discussions and Laval went on to Russia without even seeing him.

The government announced it would continue to function as though Pilsudski were alive. The authority of the dictator, it said, has passed to his lifelong friends, President Ignace Moscicki, Premier Slawek, Foreign Minister Beck and Gen. Edward Rydz-Smigly. The appointment of General Rydz-Smigly as Pilsudski's successor as inspector general of the army was in accordance with the marshal's command.

The government denied any changes were impending. It announced that both the internal and foreign policies which Pilsudski inaugurated will be followed faithfully by the men he had trained for executive positions.

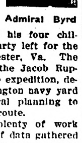
RIGID censorship, such as would be imposed in war time, shrouded the American fleet's tactical operations in the Pacific, but was relaxed enough for the announcement of two unfortunate occurrences. While destroyers were leading larger vessels through an "enemy" network of submarines the Lea smashed into the Sicard, tearing a big hole in her side. Richard Chadwick, second class gunner's mate on the Sicard, was killed and three other men were slightly injured, official records stated.

Commander E. W. Tod.

Lieut. Mathias B. Wyatt of San Diego, a graduate of the naval academy, was piloting one of eighteen fighting planes which took off from the aircraft carrier Saratoga 200 miles east of Honolulu to ward off an attack of "enemy" submarines. His plane was caught in the slipstream from another and fell into water three miles deep. No trace of him or his ship was found.

In connection with the maneuvers the greatest interest was in the mass flight of forty-three planes from the Pearl Harbor naval base westward, presumably to Midway islands. They were under the command of Commander E. W. Tod, U. S. N., and for the time being all that the public was permitted to know was that they reached their secret destination safely and were "executing their missions." One report was that the planes made one stop en route and that forty-one of them finished the flight together, two arriving later.

REAR ADMIRAL RICHARD EVELYN BYRD and members of his South Polar expedition came sailing home at last on their ship Bear of Oakland and were given the warmest kind of a welcome in Washington by President Roosevelt, Secretary of the Navy Swanson, other officials and a host of their relations and personal friends. The admiral and Mrs. Byrd spent a night in the White House. Then he was joined by his mother, Mrs. Eleanor Bolling Byrd, and his four children, and the family party left for the Byrd home at Winchester, Va. The Bear of Oakland and the Jacob Ruppert, supply ship of the expedition, departed from the Washington navy yard for Boston, the admiral planning to board the Ruppert en route.



Admiral Byrd

Admiral Byrd has plenty of work ahead, with the mass of data gathered in the Antarctic, a book to be written and a lecture tour to be made, but his plans for the immediate future were uncertain. "I would like to take a little vacation," he said. "Perhaps it will be in the Maine woods, where it will be cool."

THE administration's program in the senate was delayed by a renewal of Huey Long's attack on Postmaster General Farley. The Louisiana senator called up his resolution for an investigation of Farley and produced some new charges, and a protracted debate ensued. Long submitted an affidavit made by Helen Humphreys, a former employee of the James A. Stewart company, New York contractors, accusing Farley of manipulating government contracts and giving valuable stamps to prospective purchasers of materials from the General Builders' Supply corporation, Farley's firm. These stamps were so valuable, Long charged, that a bank lent $40,000 on them.

BY A vote of about 2 to 1 the striking workers in the Toledo Chevrolet plant decided to accept a compromise offer that had been fixed up by federal labor committeemen, A. F. of L. leaders, company officials and federal mediators. It was expected that this would result in the return to work of 35,000 men in Toledo and other motor car manufacturing centers. The strike in Toledo was engineered by the local union and really was not in accord with the plans of the American Federation of Labor.

RURAL electrification administration, one of the new divisions of the works relief program, was established by President Roosevelt in an executive order, and Morris L. Cooke, a Philadelphia engineer, was appointed to be its chief. The sum of $75,000 was allotted for its administrative expenses, and allocations are to be made later for authorized individual projects.

M. L. Cooke

The executive order described the duties and functions of the new unit as "to initiate, formulate, administer and supervise a program of approved projects with respect to the generation, transmission and distribution of electrical energy in rural areas."

The order permits the administrator to acquire by purchase or by the power of eminent domain any real property or any interest therein and improve, develop, grant, sell, lease or otherwise dispose of any such property.

DENNIS CHAVEZ, who contended that he really defeated Bronson M. Cutting in the election of a United States senator from New Mexico last year, now has Mr. Cutting's seat in the senate. Following the senator's death in an airplane crash, Mr. Chavez was appointed by Gov. Clyde Tingley to fill the vacancy. He will hold office until the next general election in November, 1936, when a successor will be elected, and that is likely to be Mr. Chavez again.

Dennis Chavez

The new senator, who is the head of the Democratic party in New Mexico, was born in that state 47 years ago. While serving as a senate clerk he attended Georgetown university law school and after returning to Albuquerque to practice law he was elected to the state legislature. In 1930 he was elected New Mexico's one representative in the national house and was re-elected in 1932. He resigned in 1934 to oppose Cutting in the senatorial race and was defeated by about 1,000 votes.

EXTENSION of the NRA for one year, and not for two as asked by President Roosevelt, is advocated by the American Liberty league, which in a statement issued from Washington says the resolution offered by Senator Bennett Clark is the most feasible method of rescuing business from bureaucracy and experimentation.

"Commendation is due to the senate finance committee, which voted out the resolution of Senator Clark rather than the administration bill of Senator Harrison," the league said. "The bill has all the earmarks of a tricky attempt to avoid a definite determination of the constitutional validity of the recovery act through a decision of the Supreme court.

"The shifting of the legal foundation of the NRA might permit its continuance, following an adverse decision, until new test cases could be advanced through successive steps to the highest court.

"The Clark resolution, aside from its advantages, is free from any attempt to prevent the courts of the nation from fulfilling their constitutional duty of passing upon the validity of the legislation."

SEVENTEEN years ago the first official government air mail service between New York and Washington was established, when Lieut. Torrey Webb in an army plane started from Belmont Park, L. I., for the National Capital with a load of mail. The anniversary was celebrated at Newark airport with the opening of the new $500,000 administration building, federal, state and New York city officials taking part in the program. Amelia Putnam dedicated a new amphibian plane, and one of the original six army mail flyers, Lieut. Edwin W. Kilgore of Short Hills, N. J., was among those present.

BECAUSE the Patman inflation bonus bill would be easier for the President to veto than the Vinson measure, some of the administration senators joined with the Patman followers to put the former bill through the senate by a vote of 55 to 33. Previously, for some devious reason, the senators put aside the compromise measure offered by Pat Harrison's committee with the assurance that Mr. Roosevelt would sign it. That the President would veto the Patman bill was taken as a certainty and it was believed the inflationists could not gather enough votes to override the veto in the senate, though they had enough in the house.

Rep. Patman

Rather surprisingly, Senator William G. McAdoo of California, a former secretary of the treasury, advocated the Patman bill, asserting that it was "a mere conjecture" that the issue of $2,200,000,000 in noninterest bearing notes, or greenbacks, would be inflationary.

"We have nothing in the United States today but greenbacks," he said. "Is your money redeemable in gold? Is it redeemable in silver? No. It is redeemable in nothing but the honor and good faith of the American people.

"What constitutes inflation is a matter of conjecture. It is also a mere conjecture that we must have a so-called specie basis. The best proof of that is that, since going off gold, the dollar is as sound as it ever was.

"The issuance of $2,000,000,000 in new currency would affect the credit of the United States about as much as if I threw a shovelful of sand into the ocean and tried to stop the incoming tide."

Some friends of the measure, after the President indicated he would veto it, decided it might be better to amend it than to lose it entirely. They proposed to give the President the choice of several ways of paying the bonus certificates.

ACCORDING to the Department of Justice, its plans for the establishment in Washington of a national crime institute and a central radio station for broadcasting police news are nearing completion. An advisory committee has made a preliminary report on the crime institute, and 200 local police officials have warmly endorsed the suggestion of J. Edgar Hoover, chief of the division of criminal investigation, for the establishment of the radio station.

A modest beginning for the training school, crime laboratory and "clearing house," to be known as the National Crime Institute, was suggested by the advisory subcommittee, headed by Justin Miller, special assistant to the attorney general.

About twelve states, including New York, Illinois and Ohio, have already started or completed plans for coordinating police and law-enforcement activities through state departments of justice, it was revealed, and the contemplated crime institute would offer them facilities for training their personnel in scientific police methods and for co-ordinating their general work.

ETHIOPIA'S government renewed its demand that arbitrators be named to settle the disputes between that country and Italy, as provided in a treaty, and Great Britain and France were reported to be trying earnestly to persuade Italy to a peaceful course. Unless settlement of all differences is assured at the League of Nations council meeting May 20, or if more Italian troops are sent to the Ethiopian border, Emperor Haile Selassie will mobilize his warriors.

Foreign residents of Addis Ababa said they were ignorant of any war preparations by Ethiopia, and that there had been no troops or munitions concentrations or censorship on travel. This contradicted a story in a Rome newspaper to the effect that great quantities of munitions had been shipped into Ethiopia and were being concentrated, along with thousands of troops, near the borders of Italian Somaliland and Eritrea.

FROM Mexico City to the Metropolitan airport at Newark, N. J., nonstop, 2,100 miles in 14 hours and 22 minutes. That is the new record set up by Amelia Earhart in her red monoplane. Her husband, George Palmer Putnam, and more than 3,000 other enthusiastic persons were at the airport to welcome her, and she was almost mobbed by the throng.

Amelia Earhart

After her start from Mexico City, Mrs. Putnam was not heard from nor reported seen for more than six hours. Her course took her straight east at first, high over the mountain peaks between the Mexican capital and Tampico. She was not seen at the oil port, nor was she reported by radio. Observers knew, however, that she expected to be above 10,000 feet as she crossed the shoreline out over the gulf for her 690 mile hop over the water to New Orleans.

Passing over New Orleans, she communicated by radio with the Department of Commerce station there, and then flew swiftly along the airways of American Air Lines and Eastern Air Lines. As she swooped over Hoover airport, Washington, Eugene Vidal, director of the air commerce bureau, radioed: "You have done a splendid job, so come down." But Amelia replied, with thanks for the invitation, that she was going on through.

Duluth—Rains of the past two months have raised levels of Minnesota's lakes and streams from several inches to two feet above the record low levels of last summer, state and federal officials report.

Owatonna — Spelling champions from 80 school districts of Steele county competed here in the fifth annual county rural school day. More than 1,400 pupils attended the event, and participated in the parade.

Grand Rapids—The state conservation commission authorized the forestry division to buy 15,000 acres of land at from 50 cents to $2 an acre for addition to the George Washington forest near Grand Rapids, Savenah forest near Aitkin, White Earth forest near Itasca park and Cloquet Valley forest near Two Harbors.

Walfred Erickson, Hallock, vice president; the Rev. Elmer Dahlgren, McIntosh, secretary, and Emil Gahlon, Alexandria, treasurer.

Staples—Edward C. Johnson of Staples, a high school teacher at Preston, is the first person to be arrested by postal inspectors in Minnesota in connection with chain letter activities. Pleading guilty to lottery charges growing out of a dime-letter scheme, Johnson was released on a personal bond of $1,000 and ordered to report in federal court at Winona June 18.

International Falls—Indications of heavy resort business this season in northern Minnesota has prompted the Northern Pacific to establish daily sleeping car service between St. Paul-Minneapolis and International Falls, E. E. Nelson, passenger traffic manager of that railroad, announced. Northbound service from the Twin Cities will begin on May 28, and southbound from International Falls on May 29.

Roseau—Sales of state-owned trust lands this spring reveal a marked tendency to return to the land, according to a report completed by F. A. Wildes, director of the division of lands and minerals, state department of conservation. Sales in 21 counties, chiefly in northern Minnesota, amounted to 21,920 acres, Mr. Wildes reported. The total compares with sales of 7,900 acres a year ago and 2,940 acres in the spring of 1933.

St. Paul—Five hundred applications for scaling down of mortgages of the state rural credit bureau have been filed, and the first of a long series of mortgage reductions will be submited to district courts for approval in two weeks, Theodore H. Arens, conservator, announced. This proceeding is under one of the acts of the recent legislative session, authorizing the conservator of the department to arrange for reducing the amount of mortgages outstanding.

St. Paul—The Edward G. Bremer kidnap-conspiracy case may reach the jury with only six of the 11 defendants with which it started remaining. Close on the heels of the announcement that Elmer Farmer, charged with arranging the hideout in Bensenville, Ill., where Bremer was held captive 22 days, would plead guilty before the defense rests, came the revelation that Harold Alderton, whose home served as the hideout, probably will take the same course. Both men have admitted participation in the abduction in lengthy statements to federal agents which were introduced in evidence as part of the government case. Originally the two men were slated to take the witness stand in their own defense, but as the evidence piled up against them, they decided to throw themselves on the mercy of the court, it was said.

Kimball—Former Senator Magnus Johnson of Kimball, sent a 90-word telegram to President Roosevelt urging the chief executive to sign the Patman bonus bill which will distribute more than $2,000,000,000 to World war veterans.

Marshall—Marshall's new mayor W. W. Cook, pursued a caravan of gypsies 19 miles to arrest two women members of the band charged with theft of $360 from William Fliege, 75-year-old Marshall resident. The money was recovered, and the women ordered out of the city.

MANY USES FOR LEAD

The modern woman is greatly indebted to lead, says a bulletin of the National Geographic society. Disks of it make her coat hem hang straight, and seal her luggage in transit. Lead puts an extra sparkle in her cut glass vases and synthetic diamonds. Her cloisonee enamel ware contains lead and her hammered bracelets were beaten on a soft lead anvil. She probably prizes an antique pewter tea set made of lead alloy. Her children eat candy from tin-coated lead foil. They paste paper dolls with library paste from collapsible tubes of lead alloy, and play with fire engines, soldiers, and animals die-cast from lead.

SYNOPSIS

Theodore Gatlin adopts a baby, "Penelope," in an effort to solve his matrimonial troubles. But his wife has never wanted her, and their affairs end in the divorce court. At a baseball game a ball strikes ten-year-old Penelope on the nose. Mrs. Gatlin spirits the child to Europe. Gatlin wills Penelope all his money, and is about to begin a search for her when a motor accident ends his life. Some ten years later, in San Francisco, Stephen Burt, rising young psychiatrist, is presented by Dan McNamara, chief of police, with a new patient—Nance Belden, a girl with a dual personality, for which her "saddle nose" is in part responsible. McNamara does not think she is a criminal and obtains Burt's testimony in court. Lanny, the doctor's office nurse, is also won over. Nance's criminal record outweighs Doctor Burt's explanation of her case and she is sent to San Quentin penitentiary. Nance escapes, although shot, and goes to Lanny's apartment, from which, by McNamara's orders, she is removed to the chief's home. From one of the men in the boat on which the girl escaped McNamara learns that Nance's real name is Penelope Gatlin. He also discovers that she is heiress to $750,000. Fearful of McNamara, in his official capacity, Nance flees. Lanny finds her in her apartment, asleep. Knowing detectives are on her trail, she disappears.

McNamara chuckled. Flynn and Angelloti would waste a great deal of time watching that apartment house in vain. Nance, discovering Ella Cates had moved, had sought quarters elsewhere. What puzzled McNamara, however, was the girl's failure to communicate with him or Lanny; and he knew now that she did not intend to. The fact that she had purchased a letter of credit was proof that she intended leaving the country, and the more the excellent fellow contemplated this impending move the more inclined was he to regard it as a not unmixed blessing.

The more he thought the matter over, the more inclined did he become to take a practical and policeman-like view of the situation. While Nance remained in San Francisco she would be a constant menace to himself and Lanny; if captured she might, during one of her uncontrolled moments, consider it a great joke to tell the world how she had been enabled to escape capture so long.

"I can't baby the world," he decided. "I'll let her go. She'll probably live abroad, and when her letter of credit is gone she may remember who she is long enough to draw more checks. I can always get a line on her through the bank, and if Steve and Lanny still insist on salvaging this nut I'll tell them where to find her. Me, I'm through. If I keep this pace up I'll be as big a nut as she is."

There is more than a modicum of truth in the ancient adage, "Out of sight, out of mind." Dan McNamara lived a very full life; and when Nance Belden had definitely passed beyond his ken and he knew himself safe at last from the prying of Messrs. Flynn and Angelloti into his private affairs, he forgot the girl, for pressing matters of great importance claimed his attention and he required more first-class assistance than he was receiving. He resolved, therefore, to give Flynn and Angelloti a week in which to make up their minds they had lost the trail; then to call them in.

On the sixth day, however, he received information that the doughty pair were still as busy as two pups with a feather duster. A beautiful lady called on him at his office and told him so.

"And who might you be?" he demanded.

"I'm Susan Engelbright."

"I am not aware that I have the pleasure of your acquaintance, Miss Engelbright."

"You haven't. I was sent up from Oakland."

"Oh! Alias Sapphire Susie! I've heard of you lately."

"Perhaps. I hocked three twelve-carat sapphire rings to raise money, and the papers called me Sapphire Susie after that."

"I see you got them out of hock again, Susie."

The girl nodded. "Nance Belden got them out for me."

"Part of the bargain for smuggling that letter out of San Quentin for her, I suppose."

"Never mind what it was for." Sapphire Susie smiled archly and unafraid. "I earned it and she kept her word."

"Check or cash?" McNamara was frightened. If Sapphire Susie had been given a check, then she knew Nance Belden's real name and the name of her bank. And that would be fatal.

"I don't know. I gave her the pawn tickets and she got back the rings. I don't know just how."

"When?" He was relieved.

"A week ago tomorrow."

"And you say Detective Sergeant Flynn has been giving you a bad half hour?"

"Yes, he has."

"Well, that's his business. Nance Belden escaped from San Quentin and naturally he's interested in apprehending her. You were recognized by the guard at the main gate two weeks before Nance escaped. Miss Lanning, a friend of the Belden girl, had visited the prisoner that day, and since Miss Lanning was the only visitor Nance Belden had in San Quentin, naturally she was suspected of carrying a letter for delivery to the men who helped Nance escape. You rode down to Greenbrae with Miss Lanning, and she slipped the letter to you, of course. Flynn knows that. But why come to me with your tale of woe?"

"I've run straight since getting out of the pen. I served my time and I want to be let alone—that's why! Flynn told me that if I didn't come through and tell him where he could find Nance Belden he'd see to it that something nasty happened to me. I don't know where Nance Belden is. And I want protection from Patrick Flynn."

"You seem pretty sure of me, don't you?"

"Well, Nance told me that you were one human being. And I called on Miss Lanning last night to tell her to warn Nance that the dicks were after her, and Miss Lanning told me to see you about it. She said you'd see I got a square deal."

"She did so, now? How did Miss Lanning treat you otherwise?"

"She kissed me and gave me a hundred dollars and told me to be as good as I could. The old girl is sure a darling."

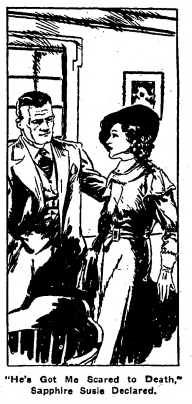
"Did you ask her for the hundred?"

"Of course not."

The chief eyed her owlishly, for he distrusted Sapphire Susie and wondered if she might not be working in the interests of Flynn and Angelloti.

"This is interesting," he admitted heavily. "Of course I only keep in touch with the upper office through the captain of detectives. If he set Flynn on this job he should have interviewed you a couple of weeks ago. Seems to me he has overlooked a good bet. If he'd had you under surveillance a week ago he'd have picked up Nance Belden when she came to you to deliver the rings. Flynn's a crackerjack detective," he added sadly, "but this looks as if he's slipping."

"That bird don't slip very far, take it from me, Chief. He met me on the street the day before yesterday and noticed I was wearing my big ring and my eardrops. 'Hello, kid,' he says, 'I see you got your sapphires on again.' I says to him, 'Fall dead, you bum,' and walked on. And the next night he came up to my room. 'Nance Belden got them sapphires out of hock for you, Susie, my dear,' he says kindly. 'I want that frail. Where is she?'"



"He's Got Me Scared to Death," Sapphire Susie Declared.

"And you wouldn't tell him, even if you could?"

"That's a fact. I wouldn't snitch on her."

"You wouldn't expect me to inferfere in the work of a detective sergeant when he appears to be doing a good job, would you, Susie? But I give you my word, Susie, that if you run straight in this city I'll see to it that you're not harassed. Of course you helped Nance Belden to escape from San Quentin, and I know it, but I can't prove it; if I could I'd put you in the birdcage this minute. And I'll not put Flynn off the case, although if he gets too rough I'll stop him."

"He's got me scared to death," Sapphire Susie declared, and commenced to weep a little; whereat McNamara realized she had been really frightened. She shook his hand warmly, thanked him and departed.

For several minutes McNamara sat thinking, a smile, faintly tender, illuminating his rugged countenance. So Lanny had kissed Sapphire Susie and given her a hundred dollars and begged her to be a good girl in the future. What a rare good sport Lanny was! And how good God had been to all concerned! In their pursuit of Nance, Flynn and Angelloti had followed such a hot trail they had forgotten Sapphire Susie was a pal of Nance's, but afterwards, when the trail grew cold, they had suddenly remembered her.

That Flynn was a marvel, and McNamara sighed to think the fellow could not be promoted instantly. In all probability he had not at first connected Nance Belden with the glory of Susie's sapphires. Undoubtedly he had jumped to the conclusion that the girl had been up to her old trick of blackmailing some wealthy and socially prominent masculine jackass. So he had looked up her record in the police files. Here he had discovered something that must have convinced him of Susie's total innocence of sapphires during her trial; certainly she had not carried them to San Quentin with her, and the obvious conclusion was that she had pawned them to raise money to pay her attorney. In the hope of discovering the identity of Susie's latest victim (who, he assumed, had redeemed them for her) Flynn had thereupon made a round of the pawnshops and located the one from which the jewels had lately been redeemed; from the pawnbroker he had secured a description of the one who had redeemed them. No pawnbroker would be likely to forget Nance Belden's nose!

McNamara shuddered. If Nance should visit Sapphire Susie now, she would undoubtedly walk straight into the arms of the waiting Flynn or Angelloti.

Well, Nance Belden had stolen a dozen pairs of silk hose, but apparently Penelope Gatlin paid her debts. The chief wondered if he had loaned Nance Belden or Penelope Gatlin two hundred dollars, for of course they were two separate and distinct personalities inhabiting the same body. If Nance Belden had accepted the loan, then McNamara could kiss the money good-by. If, on the other hand, Penelope Gatlin had accepted it, then, some day, when Nance had changed places with Penelope, he would get it back. Well, he could trace her progress through the world by the drafts she would cash. Her bank in San Jose would give him that information.

He took down the telephone and called the bank. Yes, a draft had just come in. Drawn for four hundred and thirty-five dollars in favor of the French line, dated three days previously at New York. It had come across the continent by air mail. McNamara thanked the president of the bank and called up the French line's San Francisco office. After some difficulty he discovered that four hundred and thirty-five dollars was payment of one first cabin passage to Havre and that the Ile de France had sailed from New York during the past three days.

Instantly Dan McNamara shot a straight telegram to police headquarters in New York, requesting that the passenger list of the Ile de France be checked to see whether Nance Belden or Penelope Gatlin had taken passage on her. Four hours later he received a reply to the effect that Nance Belden was not aboard but that Penelope Gatlin was.

"Nothing is lost if you know where it is," McNamara decided happily, and sent a cable to the prefect of police at Havre, requesting him to pick up Penelope Gatlin on her arrival at that port, shadow her and report by cable, collect, the girl's destination, the names and addresses of those who should meet her and any other information that would aid in keeping track of the girl.

The following day McNamara sent for Detective-Sergeants Flynn and Angelloti. As they ranged themselves, more or less at attention, in front of his desk, the chief leaned back in his chair and bent upon the pair a long, severe and penetrating look. They grew a little fidgety before he spoke.

"Well, boys, how are your private affairs prospering?"

Both shrugged, unwilling to be definite.

"They are unprosperous," the chief challenged, "so I have called you in to express the hope that you are now quite willing to abandon your private practice and return to work for the city and county of San Francisco. You draw salary from the taxpayers, you know. I may have been mistaken, Angelloti, but I thought I saw you out in Mission recently when you were supposed to be working on that racketeer killing over in North Beach. However, I'll overlook that on the assumption that you permitted yourself to be led astray by Flynn. Flynn, you lay off Sapphire Susie until that enterprising young woman does something you can pin on her. Then bring her in."

"She's done something and I'll pin it on her yet," Flynn growled, "and you know what it is." Flynn, being Irish, was unwilling that his chief should regard him as deficient in intelligence and enterprise.

"We understand each other thoroughly, Flynn. You've been after that Belden girl and you've made a mess of it." He opened his desk drawer and drew out two envelopes. One was addressed to Flynn and the other to Angelloti and both envelopes bore the return address of a prominent New York hotel, but were neither stamped nor postmarked. "These two envelopes came in a large envelope addressed to me," McNamara explained. "They're sealed!" He handed each detective his letter and watched as they opened them and drew forth typewritten letters and two hundred and fifty dollars in bills. Flynn's letter was, undoubtedly, a carbon copy of Angelloti's.

Flynn perused his letter and handed it to the chief, who read:

"Dear Mr. Flynn:

"You poor dear, you have worked so hard and so intelligently and in such dreadfully hard luck that my heart goes out to you. You were working for the reward, of course—no doubt because you needed the money. You and Mr. Angelloti would have had to divide two hundred and fifty dollars had you recaptured me, but just to prove I'm a sport and not holding any mean little grudge, I'm sending you each two hundred and fifty dollars. Please be good and try to forget all the unpleasant incidents. You will never get me now, so do give up your attempts, like good boys."

The letter was unsigned.

"How much did you get, Angelloti?" McNamara queried softly.

"Two fifty, Chief."

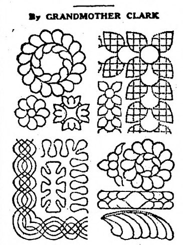
Make Selection for Your Quilt

By GRANDMOTHER CLARK



Each patch work or applique quilt requires quilting, and a design should be selected that harmonizes with the design used in the patches. Space for quilting also varies, and the women who do this work should have quite an assortment of quilting designs on hand from which to make a selection. We have pictured three different sets of perforated quilting patterns in past issues.

The above twelve patterns are not perforated. They are, however, printed in dots on perforating bond paper and must be perforated with a pin, which can be done in about ten minutes for each pattern. The patterns are eight times as large as the illustrations above.

Package No. 81A contains these twelve patterns, with cotton and blue powder for stamping; also full instructions how to perforate and stamp them will be mailed to you postpaid upon receipt of 15c.

COOLIDGE SHOWN AS SHREWD, BUT KINDLY HEARTED

A Calvin Coolidge who sold his cast-off clothing to a second-hand man, who chased a bootlegger out of his office, and who let a window sill burn in his house to warn his boys to be careful with candles, is revealed in an installment of Grace Coolidge's. "The Real Calvin Coolidge," in Goodhousekeeping Magazine.

John Coolidge confesses his indignation at finding a newspaper photograph of his father in shirt sleeves, with saw in hand, pretending to build a toy motor car.

"Father," John says, "was running for office, as was his custom in the fall of the year. A cameraman had induced the pose, but it was my car. I could scarcely believe my eyes."

George A. Dragon, Northampton barber, unwittingly gets back at John for telling tales on his father.

"One time," Dragon contributes, "I asked about his sons, who were in school at Mercersburg.

"'I guess they must be all right,' Mr. Coolidge replied, "they're always wanting something.'"

Ralph W. Hemenway, Coolidge's law partner in Northampton for 18 years, who has never before given an interview or written about him, recalls that he once received the following note from President Coolidge from the White House:

"My Dear Mr. Hemenway:

"You have at Hampton safety deposit 2 Lib Bonds $50 each. See if any are due Sept. 15 current and if so have Tr. Co. collect them and credit my acct.

"Yours,
"Calvin Coolidge."

The interest due was $2.12.

Hemenway recalls another occasion, however, that brings out the late President's kind-heartedness and liberality. When Hemenway was in need of funds owing to the closing of a local bank Coolidge gave him a check for $5,000 and offered as much more as he might need.

German Umbrella Slump

Because one cannot carry an umbrella when wearing a uniform and maintain one's dignity, the rain shields have gone out of style in Germany. As a result 150,000 people in the umbrella industry have been thrown out of work, and manufacturers are seeking ways and means to bring the umbrella into its own again.

Better Breakfasts

NOBODY minds getting up on a fine Spring morning—nobody but those of us who have been out late the fine Spring night before. But since we have a way of staying out—these fine Spring nights, why not use a little culinary persuasion? Here is a breakfast that smells so good in the making that only a dodderhead could lie abed.

And even a dodderhead could remain inert only until the coffee began to percolate. If it is vacuum-packed coffee, it smells like a million dollars because the flavor is fresh and the result, though inexpensive, is priceless, indeed.

There is nothing difficult about safe driving. What is more, there is nothing to hide or be ashamed of in safe driving.

Most people delight in telling about their fast driving - - being able to go from one place to another in so many hours or minutes. What has been accomplished by that speed? Probably inumerable instances during such a trip "near accidents" have been in the making. The law of averages is bound to change and go into reverse. When it does, those "speedy" trips will be a thing of the past.

It is much better and safer to drive at a consistent rate of speed depending upon traffic conditions, reach your objective in a state of mind that is at ease and above all in a safe condition.

Receive First AAA Checks

Fifty eight Marshall County sugar beet growers received the first installment of their 1934 sugar production adjustment payments from the Agricultural Adjustment Administration last week. These payments, distributed by William Page of Grand Forks, secretary of the East Grand Forks District Sugar Production Control Association, amounted to a total of $9,325, or an average of $160.77 per contract.

The first 1934 payments for 26 other signers of sugar production adjustment contracts of this county are scheduled to be paid soon, and the second 1934 payment will be made to all contract signers soon after compliance for 1935 have been checked in June. The amount of the second 1934 payment has not yet been determined, but it will be enough to give the 1934 crop the same exchange value that sugar beets had during the war period, 1909 to 1914.

A tax refund on 1933 sugar floor stocks will also be paid the growers soon. For all growers in the East Grand Forks district, this will amount to about $75,000, or an average of about $100 per contract.

Total payments due all Minnesota sugar beet growers this year under their sugar production adjustment contracts will amount to a total of more than $600,000, or an average of about $375 per contract.

Wheat Referendum Carries

Minnesota wheat contract signers favor continuing the wheat adjustment program after the end of the 1935 crop year by a majority of 7½ to 1. Non-signers of the contract favor it by a 3½ to 1 majority.

These facts were revealed in the preliminary returns of the May 25 wheat referendum received at University Farm, St. Paul, last week from 68 of the 70 Minnesota wheat growing counties.

828 Marshall County contract signers voted in favor of continuing the program, and 29 against it. 74 non-signers voted in favor and 9 were opposed.

About 77 percent of all of the contract signers in the state took part in this referendum, thus setting a new state record for grower participation in this type of referendum. In the corn-hog and tobacco referenda, held last October and last February, respectively, less than half of the Minnesota contract signers took part.

The referendum was held in 37 surplus wheat growing states to guide the Agricultural Adjustment Administration in determining whether or not the wheat adjutment program should be continued.

$87,027 State Tax In County

Taxpayers of this county will have to dig up approximately $87,027 in taxes for state purposes for 1935, officials of the Citizens' Tax Relief Association pointed out today in a survey showing the effect that may be expected here from imposition of the highest state tax levy ever authorized in Minnesota.

The state tax levy to be spread for 1935 is 25 per cent higher than the levy for 1934, John F. Scott, president of the association, said, and the amount of state taxes levied against property owners here will approximate a 25 per cent boost over the current levies which they are paying.

"The legislature found it necessary to authorize a tax levy of 14.95 mills for 1935," Scott explained. "The levy for last year was 11.95 mills. The 1935 levy thus represents an increase of 25 per cent, and it will be applied on valutions which very likely will be about as high as the current valuations.

"There is no general revaluation of real estate this year and no great change in total valuations are likely. The record millage of 14.95 mills will be applied on valuations that are almost as high if not as high as those of 1934. This means that the total tax levied for state purposes for 1935 will be more than $20,500,000 as compared to $16,600,000 levied for state purposes in 1934."

According to reports received at this office, there are more crops put in out in the Mud Lake country this spring than there has ever been since the land out there was opened for homestead twenty years ago.

A. L. Carlson and family spent the past week at the Twin Cities. They also made a trip to Northfield to bring home their son Rueben who has attended college there.

Raymond Halvorson and family of Viking visited with relatives here on Friday.

Assessors Using New Law

With the personal property assessment work in full swing, assessors for the first time are working under the new law eliminating personal property taxes on household goods and farm machinery. The law was passed by the recent session of the legislature in accordance with a majority vote given at the general election last November to a constitutional provision to eliminate such taxes. The labors of assessors are lightened to that extent as they make their annual visit to the taxpayers.

Under the provisions of this law, Section 1975, Mason's Minnesota Statutes, 1927, has been amended so that all household goods are now exempt from taxation. In the exemption also is all farm machinery of each farm used for agriculture or farming purposes, except tractors, silo cutters, silo fillers, threshing machines, combines, corn shellers and pea viners.

This new law will be tried out for the first time in this state. This law is intended to give some tax relief, although in many cases what a farmer may save here might conceivably be charged back against his real estate under a higher tax rate.

The Weather

The weather the past week has been rather cool and cloudy. On Sunday it started to rain and kept up thru Monday and light showers on Tuesday. Wednesday was cloudy which accounted for the luck we had in missing the heavy frost forecast for that day.

TVA CHARGED WITH WASTEFUL AND IRREGULAR DOINGS—SMITH BOOM GROWS.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

©, Western Newspaper Union.

SECRET hearings were opened by the house military affairs committee to investigate charges that the Tennessee Valley authority already has squandered $1,000,000 of government money in questionable awards of contracts for dynamite and powder and through other irregularities. Arthur E. Morgan, head of the TVA, and his two fellow directors, David Lilienthal and Harcourt A. Morgan, were summoned before the committee.

A. E. Morgan

The charges are contained in an audit of the TVA made by Comptroller General J. R. McCarl. Some of the irregularities he claims to have uncovered are:

The awarding without competitive bidding of a contract which obligated the government for an indefinite sum of money, estimated at $615,000.

Overpayments of an original contract by as much as 120 per cent.

Awarding of contracts, in contravention of law, to firms which were not the low bidders, with one contract going to a bidder who was seventh from low.

Failure to require one large contractor to post performance bond and at the same time the payment of fees to this contractor in advance, despite a legal prohibition against advance payments.

Solicitation of bids by telephone or circulars among a certain group of private business houses, or in other irregular ways.

The TVA directors were said to be prepared to disprove the worst of the charges, and to be ready to make some disclosures of their own, especially concerning the submission of uniform bids by nine munitions companies.

The inquiry came as the administration was trying to get the house committee to report favorably the bill, recently passed by the senate, providing more money for the TVA and enlarging its scope of operations.

HOUSE leaders were hurrying toward passage the administration's amendments to the AAA act, enlarging the powers of that organization, the demand of opponents for long debate being denied. It was certain this measure would arouse controversy in the senate. Jobbers and retailers of foodstuffs, of whom there are about 111,000 in the country, are much disturbed by these proposed amendments for the measure extends to them the processing taxes now imposed on food manufacturers, makes them subject to regulations not yet specified and requires that each one be licensed by the AAA.

FIRST of the list of projects to be undertaken under the works relief program is the Passamaquoddy tidal power scheme, and there is a lot of grumbling because it was placed at the head of the line by the President himself. This project was once turned down as uneconomic by Secretary Ickes, the assertion being that it would cost too much in comparison with the returns that might be expected, would take too long for completion and was in a region where so much work relief was not needed. But Mr. Roosevelt, whose Campobello summer cottage is near the location of the proposed dam site, is said to be personally interested in the project, believing it will bring new industries to the area. Another argument in its favor is that the old question of the practicability of harnessing the ocean tides may be settled by it.

Major Fleming

Anyhow, this big Maine project is to go ahead, and Maj. Philip B. Fleming of the army engineers corps has been chosen to take charge of the construction. Major Fleming has been serving in the PWA for some time but has been released for this Eastport work.

IN AN executive order the President established pay rates under the $4,880,000,000 work-relief measure, dividing the country into four sections in setting regional wages. Pay will range from $19 a month for unskilled laborers in the South to $94 a month for professional and technical workers in the East. The wages will be from 20 to 30 per cent below the prevailing wage rate structure throughout the country.

WHEN Dennis Chavez was brought into the senate to be sworn in as successor to the late Bronson Cutting of New Mexico, six "liberal" members silently walked out of the chamber in protest against the efforts that had been made to unseat Mr. Cutting. Those who participated in this unprecedented action were: Senators Hiram Johnson, California; William E. Borah, Idaho; George Norris, Nebraska; and Gerald P. Nye, North Dakota, Republican Independents; and Robert M. LaFollette, Wisconsin Progressive; and Henrik Shipstead, Minnesota Farmer-Laborite.

CERTAIN Republicans, most of them business men and financiers, have started a movement for the nomination of Alfred E. Smith for President by the Republican convention. The idea seems rather fantastic but its sponsors profess to believe that such a fusion nomination would attract great numbers of conservatives and offer the best chance to defeat Mr. Roosevelt. Other Republicans are talking about making Lewis Douglas of Arizona, former director of the budget, their candidate; he also is a Democrat.

Charles C. Hellinger of New York is chairman of a Smith-for-President committee, a non-partisan organization, and he reports that the Smith boom is gaining headway and that national headquarters will be opened this summer. Membership in the committee, he asserts, has more than doubled in the last month, much of the enrollment being voluntary. Mr. Smith has neither assented to this boom nor discouraged it.

SENATOR WAGNER of New York and Representative Crosser of Ohio offered in the senate and house identical railroad labor pension bills drafted in a way to meet the objections of the Supreme court to the law it declared unconstitutional. Because of the "must" list of measures demanded by the President, this bill may not be acted on in this session.

As re-drafted, the Wagner-Crosser bill seeks to meet specifically the ruling of the majority of the Supreme court that congress had exceeded its authority by legislating for the welfare of the workers; by invading the field of intrastate commerce, and by imposing drastic pensions provisions.

FOUR thousand farmers, gathered from all parts of the country, invaded Washington and told President Roosevelt and Secretary Wallace that they were enthusiastic believers in the efficiency of the AAA program and supporters of the amendments which the administration asks congress to make in the agricultural adjustment act. Mr. Roosevelt addressed, from the south portico of the White House, what he called a "surprise party," and prefaced his remarks with the statement that "a great many of the high and mighty" have been deliberately trying to mislead many people by "lying about the kind of a farm program under which this nation is operating." He went on to deny emphatically that the government has "wastefully destroyed food in any form."

Sen. Hastings

Next day many of the visiting farmers were in the senate gallery and heard Senator Daniel O. Hastings of Delaware, Republican, score the President for characterizing critics of the AAA program as liars.

Senator Hastings than introduced a resolution calling upon the secretary of agriculture to submit all correspondence between the department and the visiting farmers, together with any instructions sent out to county agents with a view of producing the "spontaneous" visitation. Mr. Hastings also demanded to know how the delegates were selected and what financial assistance "directly or indirectly" was extended to them by the agricultural officials.

Over in the house Representative Fish of New York started a lively debate on the same topic, and he was even more outspoken than Mr. Hastings.

Richberg has let it be known that he intends to retire from government work by July 1 and, after a long rest, to resume law practice. It is believed that W. Averill Harriman, NRA executive officer, and Sol Rosenblatt, head of the compliance section, also will resign.

RUSSIA'S immense airplane, the Maxim Gorky, largest land plane in the world, was destroyed when it collided with a small training plane over a Moscow suburb, collapsed at a height of 2,000 feet and fell in ruins. All on board, 48 in number, were killed, as was the pilot of the small plane. The victims were mostly engineers and workers of the Central Aerodynamic Institute and members of their families who were being taken for a pleasure ride.

The Maxim Gorky was a show plane rather than a practical ship and was used for spreading Soviet propaganda. It was built by popular subscription in 1934 and was an all metal, eight-motored monoplane with a wing spread of 200 feet and a fuselage 100 feet long, and was most elaborately equipped. The Soviet government announced immediately after the disaster that it would build three more giant planes of the same type.

NEVER recovering consciousness after a motorcycle accident, Col. Thomas E. Lawrence—the glamorous "Lawrence of Arabia" of war days—died in a military hospital in Dorsetshire, England. Yet in his twenties when he organized the revolt of the Arabs against Turkey, Lawrence gained undying fame. When after the peace King George sought to reward him, he refused on the ground that injustice had been done to his friends the Arabs. He changed his name to T. E. Shaw and devoted himself to experimental work in aeronautics. His writings included a brilliant account of his experiences in Arabia and a translation of the Odyssey.

ITALY is willing to make peace with Ethiopia, agreeing to arbitrate their disputes and to cease from further military measures, but on terms that Emperor Haile Selassie probably will not accept. These terms, as reported to London by Sir Eric Drummond, British ambassador to Rome, are:

First—The integrity and independence of Ethiopia are to be respected.

Second—Ethiopia must accept a division of the country into three zones of influence. One-third of the country, the Anglo-Sudan frontier, would be in the British zone. It would include Lake Tsana, which is the source of the upper Blue Nile which flows into the Nile at Khartoum. Another third would be within the French zone of influence. It would cover the railway from Djibuti, French Somaliland, to Addis Ababa, capital of Ethiopia. The third zone, under Italian influence, would include all highlands, which are suitable for Italian immigration and which comprise the only fertile section.

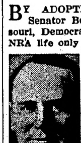
One of Italy's complaints against Ethiopia has been that slavery was still in existence there. This has been rectified by an edict of the emperor setting free the serfs. He also has abolished ancient and unequal taxes on 60 per cent of the land, substituting a fixed and regular payment.

BISHOP John Fisher and Sir Thomas More, who lost their heads four hundred years ago for opposing the marriage of Henry VIII to Anne Boleyn, were canonized by Pope Pius in a magnificent ceremony in St. Peter's, Rome, and about 50,000 persons were in attendance. The chief interest in the proceedings was in the sermon delivered by the pope, in which he urged the audience to pray that England might return to the Roman Catholic faith. The Holy Father said:

"We desire that with your ardent prayers invoking patronage of the new saints you ask of the Lord that which is so dear to our heart—namely: that England, in the words of St. Paul, 'meditating the happy consummation which crowned the life' of two martyrs, may 'follow them in their faith' and return to the father's house 'in unity, faith and knowledge of the son of God.'

"Let those who are still separated from us consider attentively the ancient glories of their church, which were at once the reflection and the increment of the glories of the church of Rome."

BY ADOPTING the resolution of Senator Bennett C. Clark of Missouri, Democrat, the senate gave the NRA life only until April 1, 1936, and considerably curtailed its powers. The expressed wishes of the President and NRA chairman Donald Richberg for a two year extension with enlarged powers were ignored. The changes called for in the Clark resolution provide for prohibition inclusion of business firms engaged wholly in intrastate commerce under NRA codes or regulations; banning price fixing except in mineral resource industries, and directing the President to revise all codes within thirty days to conform to the provisions of the resolution. Majority leaders in the house were prepared to fight for the two year extension, but admitted the Clark resolution was likely to prevail there also. In that case, in the opinion of many observers, the NRA will be practically dead.



Senator Clark

While the senate was debating the matter, Mr. Richberg told a mass-meeting of NRA workers that the Clark resolution was "complete folly." This aroused the Missourian to wrath. He called it "the most brazen exhibition of impudence on the part of a bureaucratic official which has fallen under my observation during my lifetime," and next day, in a set speech, he told his fellow senators at length just what he thought of Mr. Richberg and "his ambition to be a Mussolini in the United States."

An organization called the industry and business committee for NRA extension was called into action, as were the farmers for AAA, and its head, Ward Cheney, silk manufacturer, announced that a meeting of delegations of industries would be held in Washington May 22.

SENATOR HUEY LONG'S resolution for an investigation of Postmaster General Farley was rejected by a vote of 62 to 20, the "Kingfish" being the only Democrat recorded in favor of it.

The senate then passed the Norris amendments to the Tennessee Valley Authority act, increasing the TVA's bonding authorization from fifty to one hundred million dollars and protecting its electric power activities from court interference.

Next on the senate program was the Wagner labor relations board bill which its author declared was "responsive to the ominous industrial disturbances of last summer when blood ran freely in the streets and martial law was in the offing."

After several amendments designed to limit the power the measure inferentially gives the American Federation of Labor had been rejected, the bill was shoved through by a vote of 63 to 12.

PRESIDENT SMETONA of Lithuania saved from the firing squad four Nazis convicted of plotting to restore Memel to Germany, commuting their sentences to life imprisonment. Germany had been making a terrific row about the case, and was not at all satisfied with Smetona's action, holding that it did not correct the injustice.

St. Paul—William N. Carey, PWA state engineer for Minnesota, was appointed resident project engineer for the Minneapolis-St. Paul sanitary district's $13,774,000 federal sewage project by Works Administration, Harold L. Ickes.

Minneapolis—More than 10,000 Minnesota workers will be given employment in highway construction and grade crossing elimination work, as soon as contracts for the specific projects are let by the state highway department.

Minneapolis—Two bandits held up a special officer and three employees of the Great Northern railroad station and robbed them of $3,000, representing receipts of the Great Northern ticket office. The four men were on their way to the bank at the time.

St. Paul—More than 400 signed petitions from 11 midwst states and one Canadian province, advocating a closed season on ducks, have been received by the Midwest Conservation alliance in St. Paul. Saskatchewan is the Canadian province which has sent in petitions. The petitions will be forwarded to President Roosevelt.

Hallock—The Rev. Oscar O. Gustafson of Alexandria was elected president for his fourteenth term by the Red River Valley conference of Lutheran churches. Other officers chosen were the Rev. St. Paul—Automobile license plates for 1935 must be on all automobiles and trucks by June 1. Police and highway patrol will start a drive against cars without license plates after that time. For failing to purchase license plates by May 1, motorists must pay a penalty of 50 cents, which will be increased another 50 cents on June 4.

Hibbing—Mining companies in Hibbing will ask owners of property in North Hibbing to submit proposals to them, purchasing from those who make the best offers, according to R. W. Hitchcock, former legislator and Hibbing publisher. This will be the first step in negotiations which will lead to the purchase of North Hibbing, as authorized by the state legislature at its recent session.

Detroit Lakes—Traces of what historical experts claim to have been a terrific battle perhaps 300 years ago in which hundreds of Indians lost their lives were uncovered by the American Legion Historical Society. Excavation of an Indian burial mound—one of 20 along the north shore of Detroit Lakes—showed vestiges of the early Chippewa and Sioux tribes. Bones, skulls and jawbones with teeth well preserved and numerous trinkets were uncovered. Digging in the burial grounds is preceding highway crews building a new lakeshore road.

St. Paul—First construction in Minnesota under the new $4,880,000,000 federal work relief program will begin within six weeks, W. N. Carey, acting PWA administrator for Minnesota, reveals. Ten applications for projects that would cost approximately $1,500,000 have already been received, and others are arriving daily from communities and groups which several months ago participated in an inventory of possible construction work. The inventory showed some $265,000,000 could be spent, but only $60,000,000 of that amount is alloted to the state.

St. Paul—When the 1935 legislature exempted household goods from taxation, its action resulted in relieving owners from all taxes on diamonds and other jewelry, silver plate, art objects and like personal and household effects. So assesors have been notified. They are out now assessing personal property, but the new law relieves them of the job of ringing door bells in residence districts and interviewing housewives. The contents of homes pay no taxes, no matter how valuable.

Latin Americans Favor North American Sports

Viewing the impressive dramatics of a bullfight or swaying to the exotic rhythm of the tango is the Latin American's one idea of sport in the minds of many North Americans. But those who have spent some time in South America know what a complete misconception this is.

From Colombia to the end of Chile practically everyone can tell you what a home run is and, although baseball may be called "beisbol," it is still the same game and is enjoyed by a great many. There are, even as here, sandlot leagues, while almost every fair-sized town boasts of a number of excellent teams made up of amateurs and semiprofessionals.

Yet Americans cannot be blamed entirely for their misconception. It isn't very long since South America really awakened to the thrills found in athletics, but the progress made during this short time is astounding. Now golf balls fly in the cool air of Bogota, polo ponies rush and swerve in the land of the gauchos, spiked shoes pound where Incas once held sway, and rugby football and tennis attract their thousands from the Caribbean to Magellan's straits.

There are yearly international championships in boxing, basketball, swimming and soccer. The latter, perhaps, is the sport par excellence. Chileans may play cricket, Argentines specialize in polo. Peruvians hold track championships, but soccer really rules in every republic.

SYNOPSIS

Theodore Gatlin adopts a baby, "Penelope," in an effort to solve his matrimonial troubles. But his wife has never wanted her, and their affairs end in the divorce court. At a baseball game a ball strikes ten-year-old Penelope on the nose. Mrs. Gatlin spirits the child to Europe. Gatlin wills Penelope all his money, and is about to begin a search for her when a motor accident ends his life. Some ten years later, in San Francisco, Stephen Burt, rising young psychiatrist, is presented by Dan McNamara, chief of police, with a new patient—Nance Belden, a girl with a dual personality, for which her "saddle nose" is in part responsible. McNamara does not think she is a criminal and obtains Burt's testimony in court. Lanny, the doctor's office nurse, is also won over. Nance's criminal record outweighs Doctor Burt's explanation of her case and she is sent to San Quentin penitentiary. Nance escapes, although shot, and goes to Lanny's apartment, from which, by McNamara's orders, she is removed to the chief's home. From one of the men in the boat on which the girl escaped McNamara learns that Nance's real name is Penelope Gatlin. He also discovers that she is heiress to $750,000. Fearful of McNamara, in his official capacity, Nance flees. Lanny finds her in her apartment, asleep. Knowing detectives are on her trail, she disappears, and McNamara learns that she has sailed for France.

"Santa Claus has been good to you two, hasn't he? Well, are you both willing to go back to your regular jobs now?"

Flynn threw the money on the chief's desk. "We swore an oath—" he began, but McNamara cut him short.

"So have I!" he reminded Flynn fiercely.

"We know every move you've made in this case," Flynn shouted.

"And I knew every move you were going to make before you made it."

Angelloti tucked his present in his pocket. "Come on, Flynn," he urged.

"I can't be called off for money," Flynn persisted stubbornly.

Dan McNamara swept the money on his desk into the drawer. "The widows and orphans of the Policemen's Benevolent and Protective association will be glad to get this. On your way—you and your oath."

Flynn sighed deeply and went out. Fifteen minutes later he came back and said humbly: "Chief, I've changed my mind."

Alas! McNamara was Irish, too. He glanced at the clock. "You're fifteen minutes late, so I'll fine you two hundred and fifty dollars for tardiness and impudence and disloyalty and housebreaking."

"I'll get you for this, McNamara!"

"I don't think so. My advice to you, Pat Flynn, would be to quit monkeying with TNT. I've known detective-sergeants to be taken for a ride."

"Threatening me, eh?"

"Not at all. I wouldn't harm a hair of your red head—and by the way, red hair in the Irish is a sign that they breed back to the Danes and Swedes. A pure-bred Irishman would know enough to lay off a girl with powerful and implacable friends. All you were after was a hundred and twenty-five dollars—half the state reward for recapturing that girl—and when she sends you double that you're not sport enough to meet her half-way."

"I took an oath," Flynn mumbled.

"You should have taken a physic."

"Well, I did take an emetic. Chief I'll never forgive you those tear and stink bombs."

"Well, you shadowed my house and entered it unlawfully."

"Well, I found a lipstick—"

"Belonged to the nurse I had looking after a sick friend of mine," the chief lied glibly.

But Flynn only grinned ferociously. "I found stained bandages, too."

"Well, the pot can't get nowhere by calling the kettle black," McNamara decided. "Clear out!"

"Give me the money and I'll lay off."

But Dan McNamara shook his head. "I know your kind, Pat. There's no sense wasting good money on you because you won't stay bought. Clear out, I tell you."

So Flynn cleared out, carrying with him infinitely more respect for his chief than he had heretofore entertained. Well, some day he'd collect heavy interest on that two hundred and fifty dollars.

* * * * * * *

The last patient had left Stephen Burt's office for the day and the ever watchful Lanny had locked the office door.

"Tired, Stevie?" she queried anxiously, as he loaded his pipe.

"No, of course not," he replied abruptly. "What have I done to be tired?"

"Well, you had another session with that terrible Mrs. Merton."

"She doesn't weary me any more. She merely excites my sympathy. Still sleepless, of course, and still bothered about her poor devil of a husband. She's had detectives on his trail for a month. They've cost her ten dollars a day each and they haven't discovered anything to Merton's discredit."

"It's about time for Mrs. Merton to commence hearing voices of sorts," Lanny commented dryly. "Highball, Stevie?"

"Yes, thank you, Lanny," he said, and deluged Lanny with his sunny smile. "Yes, Mrs. Merton is hearing voices. Her first husband who is dead keeps whispering through space to her. He's trying to tell her how sorry he is. I understand he made a dirty will."

"He would—if he had any common sense. What a poor, beaten devil Merton is! He hasn't the courage of a mouse."

"What can he do, Lanny? His wife is unbalanced, but if he swears out a warrant charging her with insanity, she'll snap out of her lunacy. Mrs. Merton isn't sufficiently insane to be incarcerated. And she's a beautiful woman, well-to-do, respectable. Merton couldn't get to first base on an insanity warrant."

"Then why doesn't he divorce her on grounds of mental cruelty?"

"The man's chivalrous and profoundly sympathetic. Besides, he hasn't any witnesses to prove a charge of mental cruelty. And he can't run away from her, because he has a thriving business he may not abandon. I told her again today not to come to my office any more; that I could do nothing for her; that she was a nuisance—and to try some other doctor. She went out in a rage."

Lanny jumped up. "Now who do you suppose that is knocking? Your office hours are plainly printed on the door."

"Oh, Lanny, don't be so hard-boiled. Let the patient in."

"Who's there?" Lanny shouted angrily.

"Oh! So it's you, is it? I knew you were there," the voice of Dan McNamara boomed.

Lanny unlocked the door. "Lucky for you you're not a nut, Dan. Stevie and I are just pinning one on."

"I'll join you, if that's the case." McNamara proffered his huge hand, that resembled nothing so much in life as a bunch of bananas. "Howdy, Medico." He planted himself in the visitors' chair.

"You have news of Nance Belden," Stephen challenged.

"Gobs of it, Doctor."

Lanny entered with a highball. "I had a letter from Nance yesterday, Dan. She's in Paris. Can you beat that?"

"I can," McNamara replied coolly. "She's got an apartment at twenty-seven Rue St. Honore, with a cook and a maid, and a chauffeur who drives her around in a Citroen car. And she's having her picture painted."

"She's written you, too, then?"

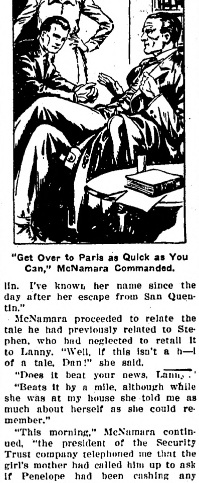
"Divil a line. I have my information from the prefect of police of Paris."

"Dan, you're marvelous!"

"What's more, Lanny, she's living with her normal personality."

"How do you know?"

"She registered as required by law, under her real name of Penelope Gatlin. I've known her name since the day after her escape from San Quentin."



"Get Over to Paris as Quick as You Can," McNamara Commanded.

McNamara proceeded to relate the tale he had previously related to Stephen, who had neglected to retail it to Lanny. "Well, if this isn't a h—l of a tale, Dan!" she said.

"Does it beat your news, Lanny?"

"Beats it by a mile, although while she was at my house she told me as much about herself as she could remember."

"This morning," McNamara continued, "the president of the Security Trust company telephoned me that the girl's mother had called him up to ask if Penelope had been cashing any checks lately. The banker gathered that the mother has a notion her daughter's dead. She doesn't like the idea of having to wait seven years to have the girl declared officially dead before she can lay claim to Penelope's estate."

"Did you find out the name of her mother?" Stephen asked.

"Oh, yes. She's married again, you understand. Naturally she didn't get any information out of the banker. He's on to her, and it was none of her business whether Penelope has been cashing checks or not."

"Get the girl's case record, Lanny," Stephen commanded. "What is her mother's name, Chief?"

"Mrs. Rudolph Merton."

"She's a patient of Stevie's!" Lanny yelled. "She's such a nut the squirrels chase her."

Stephen finished writing and laid down his pen. "I told you, Lanny, that Mrs. Merton wasn't insane enough to be confined."

"Guess I've got Lanny's news beaten, after all, Stephen. This Mrs. Rudolph Merton is the girl's foster-mother."

"Hooray! Hooray! Hooray!" cried Lanny. "How do you know? Did the banker tell you?"

"No. I dug the information up myself."

"Why? How?"

"Why? I wanted to investigate the girl's fortune. So yesterday I had a copy of the will and a copy of the appraisal of the estate made at the courthouse in San Jose and sent up to me. Gatlin stated in the will that he left all of his estate to his beloved adopted daughter, Penelope Gatlin. At the time of his death his estate was worth practically half a million dollars and has since doubled in value. Nance Belden is a lost heiress."

"Not wholly lost," Stephen reminded him. "There are times when she remembers who she is and that she has money."

"She doesn't know anything about her mother," Lanny declared. "I asked her, but she could tell me nothing. And she was Penelope Gatlin when I asked her."

"There is a reason for that." Doctor Burt's scientific mind was already racing along this new trail. "Penelope has had a wretched childhood; she knew nothing but unhappiness up to the time she received the shock that threw her mental gears out of mesh. She hated her mother with a terrible hatred. Feared her, probably. Then she made up her mind to forget her mother. And the will to forget was so strong that she succeeded.

"Not only did she forget her mother but her entire past life as well. Well, she ran away, and she'll never find her way back until she acquires sufficient courage to face the old issues again, surmount them and defeat them."

"But is that possible?" McNamara asked.

"Quite. She will have to have assistance and the sort of treatment I think I can give her, and she must have assurance that never again will she be subjected to the old unhappiness. By the way, I wonder if Penelope was a love child. Have you looked up her parentage, Dan?"

"I haven't. Can't you ask Mrs. Merton about the girl?"

"I suppose I could. But if lunacy ran in the family of her father or mother, I'm not going to bother with Penelope."

"If you decide to take her on, we'll have to get her back into this city," McNamara mourned, "and Flynn will pick her up."

"We'll fix her nose first," Lanny said.

McNamara beamed upon her. "Her criminal photographs and Bertillon measurements are gone to glory, Lanny. What did Penelope say in her letter?"

"Not a great deal. She said, among other things, that after leaving my house she found two hundred dollars. So she returned it."

"Give me that two hundred, Lanny. Stephen, our little thief is honest."

"As one personality she would remember you gave her two hundred dollars, but as the other she couldn't remember who gave it to her," said Lanny.

"Get over to Paris as quick as you can," McNamara commanded, "or she'll be stealing the Eiffel tower."

"Stephen can't spare me," said Lanny.

"Stephen can spare you," he decided.

"It's got to be," McNamara urged. "Nance fled the town with a letter of credit for ten thousand, but she'll go through that like a weasel through a rat hole. Take a bankroll with you, Lanny, and when you get there take charge of her funds."

"And have her nose done over while you're there," Stephen urged.

"There's a hitch," said Lanny. "The girl evidently got a passport in New York—"

"Not in New York. In San Francisco," McNamara interrupted.

"Well, will a strange photograph on her passport get her back into the United States?"

"She can go to the American consul in Paris, and present proof that she's the same woman with a different nose," Stephen said.

"She'll do nothing of the sort." McNamara was very emphatic. "When her trail is lost it will be lost forever. Lanny, when you have that new nose built for the girl, have half a dozen new passport photographs of her taken, and send them and her passport to me. The seal of the United States of America is on the passport and covers a part of the photograph. I know a man that'll make me a seal that would fool the American eagle himself. We'll fit it down over the old seal and stamp the new photograph. Then I'll send it back to you—and may God have mercy on my soul, for you can blackmail me for that the longest day I live," Dan cried.

Naming the U. S. A.

The name United States of America is really an evolutionary product, a name which began to develop as soon as the colonies banded themselves together, notes a writer in the Cleveland Plain Dealer. Some of the old local coins refer to the "Unity States of America." The Declaration of Independence asserts "that these united colonies are and of right ought to be free and independent states." It also speaks of them as the United States of America. So do the Articles of Confederation and Constitution. The "authority" by which the name is used is that of the people, as delegated to the Continental congress and the other bodies which shaped the form of our government.

BLACK WALNUTS EXCELLENT CROP IN DROUTH AREA

One neglected tree which offers possibilities not only of a sure financial return, but an excellent solution of drouth conditions is the black walnut.

This type of tree roots deeper than most and because of its habit of sending its roots far down into the lower soil can maintain its life and produce its crops when all the surface crops around it fail.

Heavy yields of walnuts were reported last fall from practically the whole commercial range of the tree, from Pennsylvania to Arkansas, says the Chicago Tribune. One dealer in walnuts in western Arkansas buys an average of 600,000 pounds of nuts each season. Two years ago he purchased 1,000,000 pounds, and had a heavy carry over, which he disposed of easily last year, when the walnut crop was short. The nuts keep very well stored in cellars.

Commercial cracking plants have been established in many parts of the country. The farmer, however, has certain advantages over the large operator. By careful cracking and removing of the kernels on the farm, an average of 14 pounds of kernels may be obtained from 100 pounds of nuts. The industrial plants using machinery net about ten pounds. The hulls make excellent fuel.

Food and confection concerns consider black walnut kernels a staple product, and some place single orders for as much as 10,000 pounds.

Farmers and state forestry departments planted millions of walnuts and large numbers of nursery raised seedlings last year, especially in the Ohio valley states. A dual purpose tree, the black walnut is a favorite for farm planting over a wide range. Once plentiful in the hardwood forests, walnut was used prodigally for fencing, fuel and building. Later demands for gun and furniture stock further depleted the supply. Fortunately the walnut tree is a fairly rapid grower, and excellent for farm forestry purposes. Foresters are urging more extensive plantings of both nuts and seedlings where remaining old trees indicate the walnut will thrive.

Mr. Smith Is Somewhat Wrought Up!

He's just finished trying to cull the worthwhile news out of a dozen dailies, and what is really going on in the world is still somewhat vague. That's the reason for his display of temper. Mr. Smith might have saved himself this emotional outburst if he had read the

Safetygrams

BY FRED W. BRAUN
The Safety Man

How many times have you driven in the left lane or the lane next to the center of the street and suddenly have a driver in the right lane cross your path to make a turn?

Never swing suddenly from the middle of the street across following traffic to make a right turn. Never swing suddenly from the lane next to the curb across traffic to make a left turn. If you are going to turt right, keep to the curb and th that lane of traffic. Then when you come to the corner to make the turn right, you will not interfer with any traffic and can turn right safely. If you are going to turn left at the corner, keep in the traffic lane next to the center of the street and you will be able to turn left without interfering with traffic. Use the arm signal.

Holt Sportsmen Lost Contest

The Holt Gun Club lost the crow shooting contest to the sportsmen at Newfolden according to the number of points that was counted here the forepart of the week by Game Warden W. H. Quist. The reason for losing the contest was laid to the fact that several of the local boys did not bring in their crow feet and gopher tails to be counted.

According to what was stated here, Newfolden had about seven thousand points and Holt had fifty-five hundred. It was learned that if all points would have been brought in the local club would have won by about three hundred points. The boys had a big time anyway during the shooting.

Patrolmen Checking All Cars

More than half of the automobiles on Minnesota highways have defective lights, while about 15 per cent have defective brakes, if 5,000 cars checked by the state highway patrol in the past two weeks are typical of the rest of motor vehicles, according to a highway department bulletin.

In view of these conditions, the patrol will continue its present intensive checking campaign until the whole state has been covered. Return trips also will be made to localities already visited.

The patrol has issued a public warning that drivers will avoid trouble and expense, and at the same time will be aiding the cause of public safety, if they have their drivers license at all times on the road, and see that their brakes and lights are in first class condition. Several score of arrests have been made of persons driving without a license. The patrol also is making arrests for failure to have 1935 registration plates.

In the past two weeks, out of 3,978 cars given brake tests, 541 were defective. Of 1,151 cars given light tests, 664 were defective.

Clifford Eide Injured In Fire

According to reports received here Clifford Eide of Newfolden was injured quite badly a couple of weeks ago when he got burned in a gasoline explosion. He was burning brush piles and used a can of gas to light the piles. He carried the gas in an open can to prevent an explosion but he fell and his clothes became saturated on the lower part of his body and caught fire. He is now in a hospital at Thief River Falls where he will have to spend some time.

WARS ON BANK ROBBERS

National Bankers Association Pressing Active Steps to Protect Members— Losses Cut

Imprisonment or death of many desperate bank criminals the past year has brought no appreciable reduction in attacks on banks, James E. Baum, in charge of the American Bankers Association Protective Department, has reported to his organization.

In the six months ended February 28, 1935, he says, banks were targets for 169 daylight holdups and 40 night burglaries. He added that although banks that are not members number only about half those enrolled in the association, they suffered a far greater rate of attack, namely, 51 per cent of all the bank robberies committed during the period.

Losses Show Decrease

During the period under report, bank burglars and bandits exacted tribute amounting to $943,551 compared with losses totaling $1,257,000 a year ago, he said. This reduction in losses is attributed to the time-locking restrictions and other limitations in the exposure of surplus cash imposed last year by underwriters and several bank supervisory authorities.

The sharp reduction in the material loss of money and securities resulting from bank robbery this year was "overshadowed by the killing of 2 bank employees, one bystander and 5 arresting officers," and since last August bank robbery also cost the lives of 15 criminals and caused physical injuries to 10 bank employees, 12 bystanders, 9 arresting officers and 8 bandits, a total of 62 casualties.

Investigations by the association's agents resulted in the arrest of 36 forgers, 42 bandits and one burglar, or 79 of the 141 bank criminals reported as being apprehended during the period.

An Old Roman Law

And Its Present-Day Significance

There was an old Roman law relating to bank deposits to the effect that a depositor who left his money only for safety ranked before a depositor who received interest for his money.

Today, in America, each of those depositors is protected against loss in insured banks. Whether or not their funds earn interest makes no difference. All depositors of an insured bank, share in the benefits of Deposit Insurance.

Deposits up to $5,000.00 in this Bank are Insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

The new dress sketched is a masterpiece in design—a fashion that is new and arresting—a model whose excellent taste lends an air of refinement at all times. The deep V yoke with the tiny buttons, and the skirt panel give length and a slenderizing line. It is exceptionally attractive made in a print of fluid, and not too large, design. Raglan sleeves and yoke may contrast, as in the detail sketch.

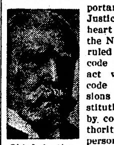
Supreme Court Kills NRA and Farm Mortgage Moratorium Act—New Dealers, Congress and Business Uncertain About Future Action.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© Western Newspaper Union.



Chief Justice Hughes

THREE unanimous decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States shook the New Deal to its very foundations. In the first and most important, read by Chief Justice Hughes, the heart was cut out of the NRA, for the court ruled that the entire code structure of the act was invalid, the code making provisions being an unconstitutional delegation by congress of its authority to legislate to persons not connected with the government's legislative functions. By the ruling the exercise of congressional powers over commerce was definitely restricted to interstate commerce, or to such activities as have a provable direct connection with interstate commerce. The court held that no economic emergency could justify the breaking down of the limitations upon federal authority as prescribed by the Constitution or of those powers reserved to the state through the failure of the Constitution to place them elsewhere.

Next in importance was the decision read by Justice Brandeis, holding unconstitutional the Frazier-Lemke farm mortgage moratorium act. This law provided for a five year moratorium in the case of collapse of efforts to scale down a farmer's debts to a figure that would enable him to pay off his mortgage. The court held that under the Fifth amendment to the Constitution private property could not be taken without just compensation. There has been no previous instance, the court said, where a mortgage was forced to relinquish property to a mortgagor free of lien unless the debt was paid in full.

In the third decision President Roosevelt's dismissal of the late William E. Humphrey from the federal trade commission was held illegal because the President did not remove Mr. Humphrey for the statutory grounds of inefficiency, neglect of duty or malfeasance in office, but, as the President stated, because their minds did not meet upon the policies or administration of the commission. The court held that trade commissioners' terms are fixed by law.

THERE was consternation and confusion among the administration forces in Washington, and no one could say immediately just how much the New Deal had been damaged or what could be done to repair the damage to its structure. Donald Richberg, chairman of the national industrial recovery board, after a White House conference, issued a statement saying that "all methods of compulsory enforcement of the codes will be immediately suspended."

The question of the constitutionality of the Wagner labor disputes bill, passed by the senate, was raised by the NRA decision. The opinion was widely expressed that collective bargaining now cannot be enforced in any business enterprise by federal statute.

In the senate demands were voiced to recommit to the committee on agriculture the amendments strengthening the AAA. Senator W. E. Borah said that the NRA decision clearly raises the question of the validity of much AAA procedure.

BUSINESS was as confused as congress and the administration after the killing of NRA. Heads of many large employing corporations intimated they would not make wage reductions or lengthen the work hours just because the way was open for such action, but always there was the qualifying statement, "It depends on what our competitors do." The big concerns would prefer to maintain the code hours and wages, but the smaller merchants and manufacturers, who were hardest hit by the code requirements, might depart from them enough to demoralize prices.

Among the dozens of national trade associations whose officers urged members to maintain wages and otherwise to continue the status quo are those of the automobile manufacturers, automobile dealers, chemical industry, retail dry goods dealers, cotton manufacturers, cement makers, oil industry, wholesale grocers, and grocery chain store distributors.

Harper Sibley, recently elected president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, called upon American industry and business men to preserve for the present wages and work hours established under the NRA.

Instead of cutting wages Standard Oil company of New Jersey and the Tide Water Oil company announced an increase of 5 per cent in salaries and wages, effective June 1.

The United Textile Workers, 350,000 in number, threaten to strike if any mills cut wages. And there is also a chance that 450,000 bituminous coal miners will go on strike because there is no wage agreement with the operators and a scale conference collapsed.

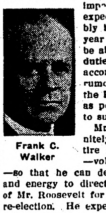
The liquor business was thrown wide open without any federal regulation except that exerted by the Treasury department in the collection of taxes. Officials of the federal alcohol control administration said that the Supreme court's NRA ruling took away from the FACA every iota of control it had over the distilling business.

ACTING with surprising suddenness, the senate passed the Copeland-Tugwell food, drug and cosmetic bill, which had been modified to meet the objections of Senators Clark, Bailey and Vandenberg. Dr. Copeland said he believed it would get through the house without difficulty. President Roosevelt favors the measure.

The bill greatly increases the scope of the 1906 food and drug act, in the definitions of adulterated or misbranded articles, and provides penalties of a year in jail or a $1,000 fine for violations.

It was designed originally to permit the secretary of agriculture to order wholesale seizures, which would permit the destruction of a business, if he deemed the articles in question adulterated. As amended, however, only a single article may be seized pending a court hearing. Exceptions may be made if there is "imminent danger" to public health.

Originally, also, the bill provided severe penalties for publishers and radio broadcasting companies, as well as advertisers, for violations of regulations to be laid down by the Department of Agriculture. This was changed so that no publisher, radio broadcasting company, advertising agency, or other medium for the dissemination of advertising may be deemed to have violated the "false advertising" provisions unless they refuse to furnish the name and address of the advertiser.



Frank C. Walker

FRANK C. WALKER'S present job as head of the division of allotments and information in connection with the work-relief program is not so important as had been expected, and probably by the end of the year or earlier he will be able to delegate his duties to others. Then, according to current rumors, he will enter the President's cabinet as postmaster general, to succeed Jim Farley.

Mr. Farley has definitely decided to retire from the cabinet—voluntarily, it is said—so that he can devote all his time and energy to directing the campaign of Mr. Roosevelt for renomination and re-election. He expects to remain not only as chairman of the national Democratic committee but also as chairman of the New York state committee. In order that he may have an income he plans to make a business connection with an important organization.

There has been a lot of talk about Mr. Farley's alleged ambition to be governor of New York. Melvin C. Eaton, Republican state chairman, dares him to run for that position.

A. M. Hyde

ONLY nine states of the Central West will send delegates to the "Grass Roots" convention of the Republican party which opens June 10 in Springfield, Ill., but the meeting will nevertheless be rather national in scope, for it will be attended by unofficial delegates from other states and by national leaders of the party. It was believed that Harrison E. Spangler, national committeeman from Iowa, would be made temporary chairman and as such would deliver the keynote address. Others on the tentative program for speeches are Arthur M. Hyde, former governor of Missouri and secretary of agriculture in the Hoover cabinet, and Edward Hayes of Decatur, Ill., former national commander of the American Legion.

The keynote address, according to reports, will take inventory of American affairs under the Roosevelt New Deal and indicate the trend of the party in opposition. Mr. Hyde is to talk on the Great Emancipator at the Lincoln tomb in Oak Ridge cemetery, and Hayes is expected to deal with the theories of the Republican party on constitutional government.

ADOLF HITLER has proposed that Germany, Great Britain, France, Italy and Belgium enter into a multilateral western European pact against aerial aggression. It follows the lines of the proposed Anglo-French air pact and would do for the nations named what the Locarno pact does with the land forces for France, Germany and Belgium.

KELLY PETILLO of California won the 500-mile auto race at the Indianapolis Speedway, setting a new record with an average speed of 108.24 miles an hour. Clay Weatherly of Cincinnati lost control of his car and was killed.

HAWAII was treated to a magnificent display of American naval power in the Pacific that continued through two days. First the forty planes that had taken part in the mid-Pacific maneuvers returned and the entire armada of 225 planes participated in an aerial review. Then the vessels of the fleet returned and moved to Pearl Harbor, the great naval base, which they all entered in a crucial test of the harbor's capacity as an anchorage. The navy's largest submarines were with the battleships and cruisers, and there were 700 marines on the target ship Utah.

Navy Memorial day in Japan, the thirtieth anniversary of Admiral Togo's destruction of the Russian fleet, brought forth a pamphlet from the navy's propaganda bureau which made significant allusions to the United States. It said:

"Then Russia was the rival and the danger. Today that is changed. We have had to face in another direction. We are confronting another great sea power which is increasing its navy with Japan as the target.

"We need a navy sufficient to protect our sea routes to the continent of Asia and to face the menace in the direction of the great ocean. That is why Japan demands parity with the greatest navies. If Japan's just and reasonable demands are rejected by the powers, causing failure of the efforts to reach a new naval agreement and leading to a naval construction race, the responsibility will not be ours. In such case the only thing for Japan to do is to resort to resolute measures for self-protection."

Benito Mussolini

THOUGH the League of Nations council ended its session in Geneva with the hope that it had arranged matters so that war between Italy and Ethiopia would be averted, the prospects for such a settlement are not bright. Under pressure from Great Britain and France, Mussolini consented to recognize the league's jurisdiction over the quarrel and agreed to arbitration. But immediately thereafter Il Duce told the chamber of deputies in Rome he would not allow Germany to make of Ethiopia "a pistol perennially pointed at us in case of trouble in Europe" and asserted he was ready to take the supreme responsibility to sustain by every means Italy's position in east Africa. He alluded bitterly to Britain and France, and indicated that he believed that Ethiopia was perfecting its army with the help of European powers inimical to Italy.

Following this address, Mussolini ordered the mobilization of thousands of officers and technical experts of the class of 1912.

SAN DIEGO'S beautiful world's fair, the California Pacific exposition, was thrown open to the public practically completed. Thousands of visitors moved along the ancient El Camino Real to Balboa park on the opening day and viewed with delight the handsome buildings and interesting exhibits. The climax of the opening ceremonies came in the evening when President Roosevelt addressed the throng by radio from his study in the White House.

JAPAN, ready to take control over more Chinese territory, delivered to the government at Nanking an ultimatum charging that Dictator Chiang Kai-shek, as well as Gen. Yu Hsueh-chung, chairman of Hopei province and commander of Chinese troops in north China, were directly responsible for a long list of alleged infractions of the Tangku truce signed May 31, 1933, marking the conclusion of the Sino-Japanese hostilities over Manchuria.

Dispatches from Tokyo said Japanese officials admitted plans had been made to include Peiping and Tientsin within the demilitarized zone, which at present lies north of the two cities. Threats were made to bomb and occupy both those cities.

FIGHTING desperately to save the franc and prevent inflation, Premier Flandin of France staked everything on a demand that he be given dictatorial financial powers until the end of the year, and lost. The chamber of deputies voted against him, 353 to 202, after a dramatic debate, and Flandin and his cabinet immediately resigned. M. Fernand Bouisson, who was committed to the support of the franc, was called on to form a new government.

DR. ALAN ROY DAFOE, Judge J. A. Valin and Minister of Welfare David Croll of Ontario, guardians under the king of the Dionne quintuplets, put on a party for those famous babies on their first birthday, and there was a great crowd of visitors in the little town of Callender. But Mr. and Mrs. Dionne, resentful because the infants have been removed from their charge and home to a special hospital across the street, refused to attend the festivities. The five little girls, who are in good health and growing rapidly, were displayed briefly and were permitted to crow or cry into the radio microphone.

CARLOS MENDIETA, president of Cuba, has announced that he will not be a candidate next winter to succeed himself. Therefore the race is expected to narrow down to Miguel Mariano Gomez, twice mayor of Havana, and Mario G. Menocal, former president of the island republic.

Scientists Claim Brain and Brawn Go Together

The theory that brains and brawn go together was put forth recently by a group of scientists who had assembled to discuss the world's ills and how to cure them. A large chest expansion is a symbol of mental breadth, it was said, while a narrow chest denotes compressed intelligence. Children who are the best students, surveys have shown, are those with the biggest chests. Statistics were called in to show that more successful persons, as a rule, have more generous height and girth measurements than their less fortunate neighbors. Thus the idea of brain power being associated with brawn has been elevated somewhat from the field of physical culture arguments.

Among the statistics cited in support of the theory that larger dimensions are indicative of business success were those showing sales managers, on the average, to be twenty-five pounds heavier and one inch taller than salesmen. Railroad presidents appear to be thirty-one pounds heavier and one and one-half inches taller than station agents. The relative avoirdupois of generals and private soldiers was not given.

Regardless of the scientific explanations of these phenomena, the ordinary man—possibly the station agent—has some sensible views on the subject. In the first place, he readily will grant, good health is the best stimulant for a smoothly working brain. There are exceptions, of course, as in the case of the genius who has cultivated his brain cells to compensate for physical deficiencies, but in the main the better a person feels physically the more fit he feels for head work.

Canadian Sourdoughs Seek Legendary Cavern of Gold

One of the most amazing gold hunts in Canada's mining history is planned by Alberta prospectors.

Without proof that it even exists, hardened sourdoughs are planning to hunt the many hills of the White Court area for the legendary "gold cache" of Old Moostas, seventy-nine-year-old Indian, around whose gnarled figure a legend of fabulous riches and superstition was weaved by prospectors several years ago. At that time he saved a tribe of Indians from starvation by bringing back a "bag of gold" from the secret cache in the hills.

Moostas believed that the gold was put in the cache by the "Great Spirit" for use only in time of dire need, and died without revealing where it was, and refusing to tell how he found it.

The cache is believed to lie among the hills in the White Court district. It is described as a "prospector's dream—a cave lined with pure gold."

The legend is that although Moostas knew of the existence of the cache for years, he visited it only once. Several years ago, when an Indian tribe in White Court district faced starvation, Old Moostas hitched up two ponies and went into the hills.

Two days later, he walked into a trading post at White Court, dumped a "poke" of gold nuggets on the counter and bought out the store. He distributed the food and other goods among the starving Indians, and then retired to a lazy existence on the Indian settlement.

Then started a long battle of wits between prospectors and the old Indian. For years white men tried to wrest the secret from him. They plied him with questions and made many enticing offers, but the old Indian rebuffed them with stoical silence. For months his every movement away from camp was closely watched, but Moostas never visited the cache again.

Fingernail Picture Fad Started by Englishman

Stanley A. Burchett of Kensington, England, growing tired of the brightly colored nails of the modern woman, conceived the idea of painting pictures on them instead, says the Detroit News.

Burchett is a miniature painter and in 1923 the queen accepted a picture he had painted of the cenotaph for her doll's house.

The new finger-nail fashion was really the result of an accident. Burchett is in the habit of making quick sketches on his thumbnail. One day when painting a canvas of a garden he stopped work to amuse a child who "wanted a weeny one for herself."

The painting was quickly done on a finger nail and looked so attractive that the little girl's mother immediately commissioned the artist to paint her nails.

Now there is no limit to the variety of "picture" nails. One society woman went to a race meeting with a picture of her host's horse and jockey, complete even to the racing colors, painted on her nails.

SYNOPSIS

Theodore Gatlin adopts a baby, "Penelope," in an effort to solve his matrimonial troubles. But his wife has never wanted her, and their affairs end in the divorce court. At a baseball game a ball strikes ten-year-old Penelope on the nose. Mrs. Gatlin spirits the child to Europe. Gatlin wills Penelope all his money, and is about to begin a search for her when a motor accident ends his life. Some ten years later, in San Francisco, Stephen Burt, rising young psychiatrist, is presented by Dan McNamara, chief of police, with a new patient—Nance Belden, a girl with a dual personality, for which her "saddle nose" is in part responsible. McNamara does not think she is a criminal and obtains Burt's testimony in court. Lanny, the doctor's office nurse, is also won over. Nance's criminal record outweighs Doctor Burt's explanation of her case and she is sent to San Quentin penitentiary. Nance escapes, although shot, and goes to Lanny's apartment. From one of the men in the boat on which the girl escaped McNamara learns that Nance's real name is Penelope Gatlin. He also discovers that she is heiress to $750,000. Fearful of McNamara, in his official capacity, Nance flees. Lanny finds her in her apartment, asleep. Then she disappears, and McNamara learns that she is living in Paris.

This was too much. Lanny put her arms around him and kissed him on each cheek.

"And that's a seal that'll get by, too." Dan was embarrassed. Lanny was, too—so she took a hasty departure.

The two men stared after her, admiration in their eyes. "A d—d fine woman, that. None finer," said McNamara.

"Why don't you marry her?" The suggestion popped out of Doctor Burt as suddenly as it had occurred to him.

"Now, there's an idea," McNamara mumbled dazedly. "How long have you been mulling it over?"

"Subconsciously, since you entered the office. I caught a gleam in Lanny's eyes—and when she kissed you, the subconscious crystalized into the conscious."

"I'll think it over."

"You'll not think it over, Mac. You'll make up your mind now. And I can get along without her, although the going will be pretty skiddy. But of course she'll marry you if you ask her. Lanny never proffers her friendships or her loves on the half shell. And there's still time, my boy, still time."

"Not if she goes to Paris."

"I've heard of police chiefs securing a leave of absence for six months."

"I couldn't take a six months' honeymoon to Paris, lad. I've saved eight thousand dollars—"

"What? You a chief of police and only worth eight thousand dollars?"

"God help me, boy, I'm honest."

Stephen roared his merriment. "Why, you great jackass, I know that. I wouldn't let every man have Lanny. But don't you worry about money. Lanny is a business woman. She's managed me since I was a boy, and that includes my finances. I'm loaded up with good dividend paying stocks. You know, I could be a mighty good friend to the man who would be good to Lanny."

"I'll consider the proposition," the cautious Celt replied, "although I'd rather be a bachelor than a disappointed lover."

"Tell you what to do, Mac," Stephen advised. "Send her a nice photograph of yourself. If she puts it in a silver frame you may proceed with confidence."

"How will I know, my boy?"

"If it's in a silver frame on the dressing table in her bedroom, it'll be a cinch."

"How'll I get into her bedroom, you blockhead?"

"I'll steal her latchkey and have a duplicate made. Then you can investigate."

McNamara rose and held out his hand. "'Tis a pity, Stephen, my boy, you aren't in my detective bureau. Good night."

The annual parade of the police force was but a week distant, and during that week Dan lived entirely on orange juice and spent his nights in a Turkish bath. As a result he dropped eight pounds off his northern elevation. Very erect and martial he sat on a milk-white charger, while a photographer took several exposures of him and his command.

When the prints were delivered to him, he sent them all to Lanny with a note saying:

"Now that we are both in the same crooked conspiracy, I thought you might be interested in having the latest photograph of the biggest crook of them all."

The following day Stephen Burt sent him a key, and the following afternoon McNamara let himself into Lanny's house and discovered one of the photos on her dressing table—and in a gold frame! Another print in a silver frame appeared in her drawing room.

"Holy Moses!" he soliloquized. "I'm in for it now! God help me, there's no escape!"

CHAPTER IX

Upon his return to his office McNamara found in his mail a photograph of Lanny, indorsed: "To dear old Dan—from his partner in crime—Lanny." While he was gazing upon it and telling himself how little justice the portrait did the beloved subject Stephen telephoned, demanding that he come to the office.

Lanny was in tears. "I've just had another visit from Mrs. Merton, Dan," Stephen began. "It seems that after two years of inactivity, during which time she had elected to believe Penelope Gatlin dead, she has developed a crazy notion to prove it. She wants to get Penelope's fortune."

"You questioned her about her daughter?"

"Yes, but she doesn't know it," said Stephen. "I hypnotized her first and spent an hour questioning her, and it appears that this morning she visited your captain of detectives and asked him to throw out a dragnet to locate Penelope Gatlin. She brought him some snapshots of the girl—told him her real name—all about her money—the girl's habits and peculiarities—everything. When I'd discovered enough to put Lanny in tears, I awakened Mrs. Merton and sent her away happy, but with this command firmly planted in her subconscious mind—she must not think of the name Penelope Gatlin. When I awakened her I asked her if she had an adopted daughter. She replied, surprised, that she had. I then asked her the name of this adopted daughter—and a look of terror came over her face. For the life of her she couldn't think of the name and begged me not to mention it if I knew it."

"It's a pity you didn't think of doing that before she went to the detective bureau with her information," McNamara cried, and called up the Security Trust company.

"The captain of detectives has put Flynn and Angelloti on the case," he announced drearily when he had hung up, "and Flynn has already been to the bank, making inquiries. When he presented his credentials the cashier showed him everything. They'll identify that girl as Nance Belden, trace her to Paris as readily as I did, and the French government will be notified that Penelope is an escaped convict. They will immediately deport her and Flynn will meet her at Hoboken."

"But can't you do anything about it, Dan?" Lanny pleaded.

"Nothing! Flynn and Angelloti are on the trail officially now." He stared at Lanny tragically. "I'm out of the picture now and can do nothing but advise you. Send two cables—one to Nance Belden in Paris and the other to Penelope Gatlin at the same address. Say: 'Come at once—Lanny dying—cable name vessel on which leaving,' and sign it 'Steve.'"

"I'll meet her at the dock," Stephen decided. "I'm due in New York next week."

"You'll do nothing of the sort," said Dan. "I'll send that convict in my house." He shuddered and grimaced in his distress. "I could handle the wop with money, but Flynn has sworn an oath! And because I've made a monkey out of him he'll keep it. He'd rather make a monkey out of me now than acquire great riches—and if I'm broke, most likely the captain of detectives will step into my shoes, and Flynn will stand a good chance of becoming captain of detectives. Oh, murderation, Lanny darling, have you a little whisky in the house? I'm faint, so I am."

"You're suffering from heart trouble, you egg," Lanny cried savagely. "Yes! A weak heart, a soft heart, a human heart."

"Send that cable," he roared.

"Yes, get busy, Lanny," Stephen urged. "The bird of time has but a little way to flutter—and the wretched fowl is on the way."

After Dan McNamara had left his office, Doctor Stephen Burt gazed with mild disapproval upon Lanny.

"Unlike you and Dan McNamara," he said, "I dislike having the peaceful tenor of my life disturbed."

"This intrigue is myrrh and incense to me, Stevie."

"I know it. You and Dan love a fight for its own sweet sake, but I do not. I have a particular aversion to grand jury indictments, and it is a possibility you and your boy friend have let me in for."

"Fiddlesticks!"

"Lanny, I'll be angry with you in a minute. Now, listen to me, and whatever you do, do not talk back. Dan McNamara has run out on us. I mean you. He's through. Dan's rattled. If he hadn't been he'd never have ordered the sending of such a fool cablegram."

"Dan McNamara knows his way about," Lanny defended. "He's more than nine years old."

"So do I. Lanny, it will be highly dangerous to send that cablegram. How is she to know it isn't a message to decoy her back to the penitentiary? If she receives it while she's Penelope Gatlin, she is extremely liable to cable for confirmation before acting on it. That would mean a delay of not less than twenty-four hours. On the other hand, if she is Nance Belden when she receives it, she will leave Paris openly and walk right into the hands of the New York police. I'm not much of a detective, but tonight I'm a better one than that McNamara idiot."

"He's not an idiot. He's one of the finest men I ever knew."

"Keep quiet," he ordered severely. "You ditch my train of thought."

He drew a sheet of paper toward him and commenced writing, while Lanny glowered at him. Presently he sat up and read:

"Grave danger stop beat it some other country traveling by motor stop upon arrival cable address stop if need funds will cable them stop leave Paris establishment going concern stop go out for walk and disappear stop unless these instructions followed you leave trail for persecutors to follow.

"Mac."

He looked up. "How do those instructions strike you?"

PROTECT YOUR LIFE AND THE LIVES OF OTHERS!

THERE are three questions you should ask yourself about the tires you buy:
1—"Will the non-skid tread give me the greatest traction and protection against skidding?"
2—"Are they built to give me the greatest blowout protection?"
3—"Without sacrificing these two important safety features will they give me longer mileage, thus making them the most economical tires I can buy?"

Answer No. 1—Harvey S. Firestone early realized the value of tire traction and safety and was the first to design an All Rubber Non-Skid Tire. Through the years Firestone has led the way in the design and development of tires with most effective non-skid treads.

Firestone does not depend solely on traction and non-skid tests made by its own engineers — it employs a leading University to make impartial tests for non-skid efficiency of its tires, and their most recent report shows that Firestone High Speed Tires stop the car 15% quicker than the best of all popular makes of tires.

Answer No. 2—Blowout protection must be built into a tire. Friction and heat within the tire is the greatest cause of blowouts. Firestone protects its tires from friction and heat by a patented process which soaks every cord and insulates every strand with pure liquid rubber. This is an additional process known as Gum-Dipping, by which every 100 pounds of cotton cords absorb eight pounds of rubber. This extra process costs more and is not used in any other make of tire.

Leading race drivers investigate the inbuilt qualities of the tires they use, because their very lives depend upon their tires, and they always select Firestone Tires for their daring speed runs. In fact, Firestone Tires have been on the winning cars in the gruelling Indianapolis 500-mile race for fifteen consecutive years, and they were on the 5000-pound car that Ab Jenkins drove 3,000 miles in 23½ hours on the hot salt beds at Lake Bonneville, Utah, at an average speed of 127.2 miles per hour, without tire trouble of any kind. These amazing performance records are proof of the greatest blowout protection ever known.

Answer No. 3—Thousands of car owners reporting mileage records of 40,000 to 75,000 miles, is proof of the long mileage and greater economy by equipping with Firestone High Speed Tires. Let these unequaled performance records be your buying guide.

Go to the Firestone Auto Supply and Service Store or Firestone Tire Dealer and let him equip your car with Firestone Tires, the safest and most economical tires built.

Thought-Out Menus Make Bully Breakfasts

"THAT'S something!" he says, beholding a beautifully poached egg, nicely balanced on crisp buttered toast—rosy with a sprinkling of paprika and gay with a sprig of parsley for spring. He has just finished a hot cereal, delicately blended, and consisting of hominy, oatmeal and bran.

It was a bright idea—inexpensive, quick to prepare—just a matter of a bit of thought the day before. Funny, what thinking will do for menus!

Orange Juice
Mixed Cereal
Poached Eggs on Toast
Crisp Bacon
Coffee

Mixed Cereal: Put two cups of boiling water and one-half teaspoon salt in the top part of a double boiler and bring to boiling. When it is bubbling briskly add one-half cup of chopped canned hominy, two-thirds cup of oatmeal and two tablespoons of bran. Cook directly over the fire for about five minutes, then place over hot water and continue cooking for half an hour. Serve with cream. This serves four persons.

Perhaps it was the coffee that did the trick. It was vacuum-packed coffee and thus the flavor was fresh and enticing. Another cup, if you please!*

Weekly News Review deals with the important happenings and their effect upon our country. It is more than news—it is an interpretation of the news, and therefore much more valuable to the person who wants to understand what is going on in the world today.

Safetygrams

BY FRED W. BRAUN
© The Safety Man

Never pass a car on a hill, curve, or crossing unless you can see at least a quarter of a mile ahead of you. Perhaps the most foolhardy act of all is for a driver to attempt to pass another car on an uphill curve -- a serious menace to the safety of two or more cars and their occupants. Be willing to lose a minute to save a life - or perhaps a smash-up.

This practice of trying to pass cars on hills is a dangerous one. It is being indulged in daily by careless and reckless drivers and it is time that the motorists report such dangerous practices.

It takes a clear head, good judgement, and strict attention to the road to operate a car in safety. Even if you do not care what happens to you, let others live.

The Marshall County Fair

Offering a greater array of big time attractions than has ever before been presented in this section and an attractive list of premium awards that is greater than last year, preparations are rapidly nearing completion for Marshall County's 29th Annual Fair and Agricultural Exposition at Warren on July 3, 4, 5 and 6.

"We have made an effort to make the 1935 fair outstanding in every department and have spared no expense in bringing to the people of this section truly state fair attractions that will be worth coming many miles to see." said William Forsberg, president of the fair association.

The Marshall county fair has established a reputation for its high quality exhibits of livestock farm produce, women's handwork, culinary and art departments and things made by rural school children, and judging from the large number of inquiries received, more displays than ever will be exhibited this year. Entry day at the fair will be on July 3 until noon, with judging scheduled to begin promptly at one o'clock p. m. Premium lists may be secured from your local stores by writing to J. A. Grideland, secretary, at Warren.

Marshall county's 4-H club members always play a prominent part at the Fair, and with 1935's large enrollment and interest being at a high pitch, unusually large displays of projects will again be exhibited.

Headlining the grandstand programs this year will be Thrill Days during the afternoons of July 4 and 5. Thrill days will include professional motorcycle races, head-on collision between two speeding automobiles, a man driving a speeding motorbycle through a solid board wall, and Jane Schafer, the woman auto race driver in competition with a speeding motorcycle.

Each afternoon during the Thrill Days, Lew Rosenthal will present ten big circus acts, including acrobats, jugglers, roller skaters, animals and high pole acting, all showing trained men and women accomplishing almost unbelievable feats.

And Its Present-Day Significance

There was an old Roman law relating to bank deposits to the effect that a depositor who left his money only for safety ranked before a depositor who received interest for his money.

Today, in America, each of those depositors is protected against loss in insured banks. Whether or not their funds earn interest makes no difference. All depositors of an insured bank, share in the benefits of Deposit Insurance.

SYNOPSIS

Theodore Gatlin adopts a baby, "Penelope," in an effort to solve his matrimonial troubles. But his wife has never wanted her, and their affairs end in the divorce court. At a baseball game a ball strikes ten-year-old Penelope on the nose. Mrs. Gatlin spirits the child to Europe. Gatlin wills Penelope all his money, and is about to begin a search for her when a motor accident ends his life. Some ten years later, in San Francisco, Stephen Burt, rising young psychiatrist, is presented by Dan McNamara, chief of police, with a new patient—Nance Belden, a girl with a dual personality, for which her "saddle nose" is in part responsible. McNamara does not think she is a criminal and obtains Burt's testimony in court. Lanny, the doctor's office nurse, is also won over. Nance's criminal record outweighs Doctor Burt's explanation of her case and she is sent to San Quentin penitentiary. Nance escapes, although shot, and goes to Lanny's apartment. From one of the men in the boat on which the girl escaped McNamara learns that Nance's real name is Penelope Gatlin. He also discovers that she is heiress to $750,000. Fearful of McNamara, in his official capacity, Nance flees. Lanny finds her in her apartment, asleep. Then she disappears, and McNamara learns that she is living in Paris. He also discovers he is in love with Lanny.

"The instructions are fine, but why commit forgery by signing Dan's name? If the original is traced—"

"I have signed it Mac, and the world is filled with Macs. When Dan has reached his office, telephone him and tell him to do something that will prove in any court he was in his office when I filed this cablegram."

Lanny relented. "You might make a detective, at that."

Twenty minutes later Dan McNamara was listening to Lanny reading Stephen's cablegram over his private line. "Excellent," was his sole comment, "but print it in block letters. Even a typewriter can betray one. When Steve files this telegram have him pay for it with a hundred-dollar bill, and have him wear large black goggles and the rim of his hat pulled down all the way round. The girl who receives it will think one crook is cabling another. If she's ever asked what sort of man filed it, her description of the sender, plus my own perfect alibi, will put me in the clear."

"How are we to manage after she has eluded the Paris police?"

McNamara sighed gustily. "Flynn will be in touch with her bank, and every time she cashes a draft on her letter of credit, Flynn will have a line on her address."

"You're no help," Lanny snapped, and hung up. Half an hour later, from the cable company's main office, Stephen dispatched the cablegram.

With Dan McNamara definitely out of the fight, Stephen felt lonely and apprehensive. He wondered why the girl had fled to Paris in the face of Dan McNamara's instructions to flee to Lower California, to enter which no passport is required. He asked Lanny.

"Oh, that's no mystery, Stevie. I brought home from the office, intending to show it to Dan, an article by a celebrated plastic surgeon of Paris. Penelope read it with great interest. She went to Paris to consult this French plastic surgeon and also to have samples of her new nose drawn by a competent artist."

"So that's how the Paris police informed Dan she was having her portrait done by an American artist, eh? I suppose it will be her luck to be in a hospital undergoing the operation when the Paris police receive word to deport her."

"I'm afraid she's balled everything up, Stephen. Flynn will have the number of her passport and Dan will have no time to fix a new passport photograph on to it. They'll not trust to the photo to identify her if she tries to land. They'll check up on the passport number also."

"Will you never cease discussing this miserable business, Lanny?" Stephen burst out irritably. "If it hadn't been for you we wouldn't be in this wretched predicament."

When the captain of detectives called in Detective Sergeant P. Flynn and related to him the tale told to him by Mrs. Rudolph Merton, Flynn gave no sign of being particularly interested. Carefully and methodically he arranged in his mind the facts as stated, and when he left the presence of his superior, all he knew was that he was to strive to recover a lost heiress by name Penelope Gatlin, and that she had a nose that should make her recognizable anywhere.

After nine hours of refreshing slumber, Flynn proceeded to ponder the case of Penelope Gatlin of the saddle nose. "I seem to be getting my fill of girls with saddle noses who disappear mysteriously," he decided lazily—and instantly something clicked in his brain and he knew he was on the trail of Nance Belden again. An heiress, eh? McNamara had hinted at powerful influences back of Nance Belden, and she certainly must have hired the expert help she had had in her escape from San Quentin penitentiary.

"McNamara knows who she is," Flynn decided. "He's getting his—in chunks—for helping her. I'll bet it's the same girl."

He decided not to take Angelloti into his confidence. For two hundred and fifty dollars, Angelloti had agreed to abandon his interest in Nance Belden; whereas P. Flynn had scorned to quit. He would pick up the trail again alone, and when he had Nance Belden or Penelope Gatlin on his hook—well, she had to pay somebody to keep out of San Quentin, and that somebody should be P. Flynn.

He went to San Jose that day and interviewed the officials of the bank, who, when he flashed his shield, gave him all the information they possessed. Dan McNamara had artfully destroyed all the girl's police photographs, but if she had secured a passport, Flynn argued to himself, she had left two of her passport photographs with the passport office, and Flynn knew he could borrow one of them.

Flynn's shield was an open sesame to the man in charge of the passport office. Two minutes after his arrival he knew Nance Belden had secured a passport.

Employing identically the same means McNamara had employed, he traced Penelope Gatlin to Paris within three days. But he had now to prove that Penelope Gatlin and Nance Belden were one and the same person, so he interviewed the United States marshal, who secured for him one of the girl's passport photographs. Armed with this, Flynn crossed the bay to San Quentin.

"Is that Nance Belden?" he asked the matron.

"That is Nance Belden," was the reply.

From the ferry he went at once to the home of Mrs. Rudolph Merton. He stuck the photograph under her nose and asked gruffly: "Is that Penelope Gatlin?"

A tremor ran over Mrs. Merton's face. It seemed to Flynn that she was frightened, disturbed.

"Well?" he demanded. "You can't expect the police to find your missing daughter if you don't help. Is this her picture or isn't it?"

"I—I don't know. I have never heard of her before."

"Never heard of her! Why, she's your daughter!"

"I haven't any daughter."

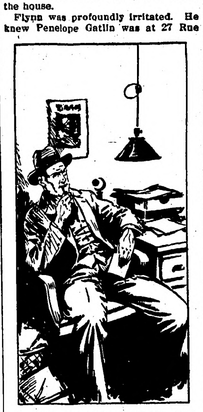
"Why, you called on the captain of detectives and asked him to find your daughter. What do you mean by telling me you've never heard of her?"

"I can't remember. I don't know. Oh, please, please don't ask me! Something terrible will happen. I—I—"

"You refuse to identify this photo as that of Penelope Gatlin?" Flynn was growing irritated.

Finally she had hysterics and a maid came in and asked P. Flynn to leave the house.

Flynn was profoundly irritated. He knew Penelope Gatlin was at 27 Rue St. Honore, Paris, but he did not know that Nance Belden was! Back at central office, he compared the passport photograph with the substitute photograph Dan McNamara had pasted on Nance Belden's fake police record card—and knew it for a fake.



Instantly Something Clicked in His Brain and He Knew He Was on the Trail of Nance Belden Again.

Suddenly it occurred to Flynn that he had had an official interview with everybody connected with this mysterious case, except Dr. Stephen Burt.

"You're a long time getting around to see me, Sergeant," Stephen charged, and indicated a large, comfortable armchair.

"I called on you once, Doctor, but you didn't know it. That was the night after Nance Belden escaped from San Quentin. Me an' my partner trailed you to the chief's house."

"I've always thought you and the excellent Angelloti didn't make the best of your opportunities," Stephen murmured. "Still, I suppose you were playing with dynamite."

"We were," said Flynn, "but no more. The chief's one of the biggest-hearted men in the world, but a picnic egg if you rub him the wrong way. So we pussy-footed."

"No fair man could deny the excellence of your pussy-footing. I know all about it. How about a wee Dock an' Doris?" Stephen suggested.

"There's an idea for you, Doctor."

Stephen summoned the butler and ordered the drink. Flynn, with great deliberation, produced Penelope's photograph.

"Do you know the lady?" he queried.

"I think I do, Sergeant."

"Who is she?"

"Is there any reason why I should express an opinion?"

"Not unless you choose to be good-natured. I suppose you know you're in Dutch for aiding and abetting an escaped convict."

"Well?"

"Naturally we don't want to make the going hard for a man of your standing," Flynn continued.

"My dear sergeant, you would have started the fireworks long ago if you had anything tangible to proceed upon."

Flynn sipped his highball. "You're being well paid for shielding this girl, of course. I don't blame you a bit, but—you're too big a figure in your profession to get into trouble with the police."

"Dan McNamara is my friend."

"Well, Mac is out of it. He can't protect you because he must protect himself. It might interest you to know that Nance Belden and a lost heiress, Penelope Gatlin, are the same person, and I have the Paris police watching her right now."

"Are you quite certain the girl is still at that Paris address?" asked Stephen.

"I know it."

"I know she isn't—and the Paris police do not know where she is."

"Do you?"

"No, but if I did I wouldn't tell you."

"Look here," said Flynn. "What's it worth to your young girl friend to have me lay off the case?"

"I'll give you twenty dollars in Confederate currency. You were offered real money once and refused it."

They looked at each other searchingly, then both laughed. "I see there ain't much use pumpin' you, Doc." Flynn admitted. "Well, a fellow can't be ruled off for trying."

"When were you to see a doctor last?"

"At the age of twenty-two. Why?"

"How old are you?"

"Forty-two."

"Well, just to prove I'm friendly I'll give you a quick physical examination. It may save you a fee later from some other physician. Mind if I give you a quick look-see?"

"Go to it," said Flynn.

Stephen tested Flynn's heart action and lungs and took his blood pressure.

"You're up thirty-six points," he told him.

Flynn was distinctly perturbed. "What does that mean?"

"It means that you have a fairly well developed case of hardening of the arteries. If you were to be re-examined physically, for promotion, you might be retired on pension."

"I couldn't afford that," cried Flynn. "I've got a wife and five children."

"Nevertheless, I would suggest you apply for a six months' leave of absence and have me treat you. How's your eyesight?"

"Grand," P. Flynn mumbled.

"I doubt it, Sergeant. I'll bet you a hundred dollars you cannot look into this little mirror fifteen minutes without averting your gaze. Want to earn the hundred?"

"I can't afford that much of a bet, Doc."

"Well, then, we'll not bet, but if you can I'll give you a hundred dollars."

Stephen produced a hand mirror and held it two feet in front of Flynn and about six inches above the level of his glance. He took out his watch. "Go!" he said. "And remember I'm watching you. If you get through this test successfully there's hope for your arteriosclerosis."

P. Flynn grinned and gazed. In three minutes the effort oppressed him. Stephen's voice reached him as from a distance.

"You are going to sleep, Sergeant."

Then, "You can't stand it, Sergeant. You're going to sleep, I tell you—to sleep."

"I'm not," Flynn protested drowsily, just as his eyes closed and his head fell forward on his breast.

Stephen's soft hands stroked the detective's brow. "Why did you call to see me?"

"To get you to identify the photograph," Flynn's voice was faint.

"Why was that necessary?"

Flynn hesitated, struggled a little, but lay back quietly again as Stephen's facile hands resumed their light massaging. "Are you going to oppose me, Sergeant?"

"No, Doctor."

"Will you answer questions truthfully?"

"Yes, Doctor." The tones were dead and lifeless, for Flynn slept a hypnotic sleep.

"Why was it necessary that I should identify the photograph?"

"I've got to know before I act, Doctor. The matron at San Quentin says it's Nance Belden, but the photograph is on the passport of Penelope Gatlin."

"Why do you want this girl?"

"She's made a fool out of me—and she can pay well to be let alone."

"You're not interested in seeing her returned to prison?"

"Not a d—n bit, Doctor. Why should I?"

"That name, Penelope Gatlin, is bad luck," Stephen warned. "Never repeat it to a human soul. If you do it may mean your death. And your oldest child will be kidnaped, tortured and killed."

"Oh, God, no!" Flynn cried out in agony.

"You must forget Penelope Gatlin and Nance Belden. Will you?"

"Yes, Doctor."

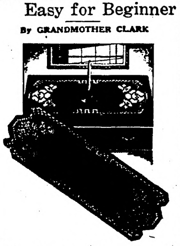
Crocheted Scarf Is Easy for Beginner

By GRANDMOTHER CLARK



There is nothing the needleworker can make that is more practical and useful than a scarf. Here is a scarf that is to be crocheted in the large filet stitch and when a number 5 steel crochet hook and number 15 cotton is used the scarf will measure about 12x34 inches when finished. Even the beginner will find the filet stitch easy and interesting to work, especially in the popular "Rose" design shown here. This scarf matches the Rose chair set shown a few weeks ago.

This package, No. 807, contains sufficient cream color Mountain Craft crochet cotton to complete this scarf, also instructions, black and white diagram for easy counting of meshes, and crochet hook.

Write our Crochet Department, inclosing 40 cents for complete package No. 807 or 10 cents for instructions and diagram sheet only.

Celebrate Birthday of Oldest Sunday School

The world's oldest—and largest—Sunday school has just celebrated its one hundredth and fiftieth anniversary.

This is Stockport Sunday school, which has been carried on continuously since the seventeen-eighties, and in the same building since 1805. It was founded by the Methodists, but was nonsectarian, and hundreds of thousands of youngsters have been taught in it. At one time its membership was over 6,000; even today it is over 3,000.

But Stockport, though it may claim to possess the oldest Sunday school still functioning today, wasn't quite the first in the field. That honor belongs to Gloucester, where, three or four years before the Stockport venture was launched, the first modern Sunday school was inaugurated by Robert Raikes, a printer, and Rev. Thomas Stock. Reading and writing were taught along with the Bible in the early years of the scheme, and the first teachers were paid.

Before that both Luther and John Knox had made experiments with Sunday schools, but the real beginning of the great movement which we know today was the Gloucester experiment of Raikes and Stock.—London Answers.

The Way of a Mule

One time over in Missouri we witnessed this incident:

A mule refused to cross a mud hole.

Five men pulled and the mule didn't move.

Then the five men shoved and the mule didn't move.

Then an automobile was used, but the rope broke and the mule hadn't moved.

Finally a little, sickly man came along, blindfolded the mule, and led the mule across the mud hole.

It was a triumph of brain over brawn.—Atchison Globe.

WHEN LIVES ARE AT STAKE

You need the same protection that race drivers demand

KELLY PETILLO ON MAY 30, WON the 500-Mile Indianapolis Race on Firestone Tires, breaking the track record and driving the entire distance at a rate of 106.24 miles per hour.

This record is an outstanding demonstration of tire efficiency. To go 500 miles in less than five hours on this rough and bumpy 26-year-old brick track, without tire trouble of any kind, demonstrates the strength and blowout protection that Firestone builds into their Gum-Dipped Tires.

AB JENKINS ALSO RECENTLY demonstrated the stamina, efficiency, and blowout protection built into Firestone Gum-Dipped Tires. He drove his 5000 pound car over the hot salt beds at Lake Bonneville, Utah, 3000 miles in 23½ hours. This was an average speed of 127.2 miles per hour, and although temperatures were as high as 120°, he had no blowouts or tire trouble of any kind.

These records are made possible by special construction features built into Firestone Tires.

Take no chances—protect your life and the lives of others by letting us equip your car with Firestone Tires and give you the Safety and Blowout Protection that race drivers demand.

Before you buy new tires ask yourself these three questions

1—"Will the tread give me the greatest traction and protection against skidding?"
2—"Are they built to give me the greatest blowout protection?"
3—"Without sacrificing these two important safety features will they give me longer mileage, thus making them the most economical tires I can buy?"

ANSWER No. 1—Leading university tests show Firestone High Speed Tires stop your car 15% quicker than the best of all popular makes of tires.

ANSWER No. 2—Unequaled performance records for sixteen consecutive years prove that Gum-Dipping gives you the greatest blowout protection ever known.

ANSWER No. 3—Thousands of car owners report unequaled mileage records—evidence of the longer wear and greater economy of Firestone High Speed Tires.

Volume—Direct Purchasing—Straight Line Manufacturing and Efficient and Economical System of Distributing to our 500 Stores and to 30,000 Dealers, enables Firestone to give you greater values at lowest prices

1 University tests show Firestone tires stop cars 15 to 25% quicker.
2 Gum-Dipped cords give greater blowout protection. Gum-Dipping is not used in other tires.
3 Wider, flatter tread gives more than 50% longer non-skid wear.

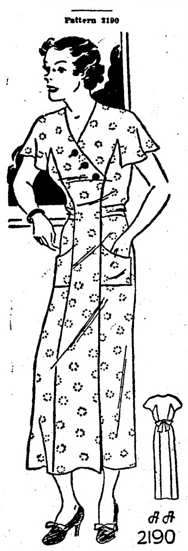
Winning Fashion for Home Wear

Pattern 2190



As simple to get into as a smock, but with all the evidences of a carefully throught-out house dress is this new model. The slightly flared cap sleeves, cut in one with shoulders, and front and back panels (which give slender lines) are attractive details. The diagonal buttoning lends further interest and the roomy pockets add a style note as well as being useful. You'll like it in printed lawn, swiss, gingham, muslin or a solid color cotton, such as broadcloth or percale. When a slightly heavier material is used, the necessity of petticoat is eliminated.

Pattern 2190 is available in sizes 14, 16, 18, 20, 32, 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46. Size 16 takes 4½ yards 36 inch fabric. Illustrated step-by-step sewing instructions included.

SEND FIFTEEN CENTS (15c) in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for this pattern. Write plainly name, address, and style number. BE SURE TO STATE SIZE.

Address orders to the Sewing Circle Pattern Department, 243 West Seventeenth Street, New York City.

"Yes, it is really remarkable," observed mother at the head of the table. "Clifford seems to eat twice as much chicken when we have visitors."

"Indeed!" exclaimed the lady visitor. "And, pray, why is that, Clifford?"

"'Cause that's the only time we have it!" replied the truthful lad.

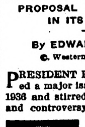
PRESIDENT STIRS NATION BY PROPOSAL FOR A CHANGE IN ITS BASIC LAW.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© Western Newspaper Union.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT has created a major issue for the campaign of 1936 and stirred up widespread debate and controversy over a question that the nation had thought was settled in its early days. Furthermore, it is likely he has started the movement for a complete re-alignment of political forces into what will be virtually two new parties. Briefly, he proposes that the Constitution be changed to take from the states and give to the federal government power over the chief social and economic questions so that the New Deal may be saved from the doom pronounced upon it by the Supreme court.



Bainbridge Colby

In the course of a two hour talk with the Washington correspondents the President sent up a trial balloon on the plan he had conceived for remodeling the government to fit his program, declaring that he favored curtailing the sovereignty of the states and giving the central government full control over agriculture, industry, commerce and all other occupations and enterprises. He said this question of amending or re-writing the Constitution must be settled by a vote of the people. In some ways, he said, the Supreme court decision was the best thing that could have happened to the country because it clarified the issue as he presented it. The issue must be met by moving one way or the other, he said, back to the 13 states or forward to the modern interpretation.

We are the only country in the world which has not solved this problem, Mr. Roosevelt said. We thought we were solving it, but now it is thrown right back in our faces. We are relegated to the "horse and buggy" interpretation of the interstate commerce clause.

That many prominent Democrats will be alienated from their support of Mr. Roosevelt by this pronouncement is certain. Already there has been launched a movement for those of the party who seek "a return to constitutional government" to unite with the Republicans who are of like mind. Its leaders are Bainbridge Colby, who was secretary of state in President Wilson's cabinet, and Chief Justice William R. Pattangall of the Massachusetts Supreme court.

Mr. Colby has written to a number of Democratic leaders of national repute proposing they meet in a southern city, preferably Richmond, "to consider some form of political action that is for our country and above party."

In a letter to a friend in Washington it was revealed that Chief Justice Pattangall had decided to resign in order to join with other Jeffersonian Democrats to bring about a coalition with Republicans and the restoration of "constitutional government" to replace the New Deal.

Neither of these gentlemen hopes to prevent the renomination of Mr. Roosevelt, but they believe he might be defeated at the polls by a coalition movement.

Of Democratic senators a number, like Smith of South Carolina, Connolly of Texas, Clark of Missouri and King of Utah, frankly expressed their opposition to the President's views. Others expressed rather mild approval. All were surprised. The conservative Republicans of course were outspoken in their disapproval of the abrogation of states' rights, and the more radical men of that party were divided. Senator Borah of Idaho voiced the opinion of many others when he said:

"There is plenty of power, absolute power, to deal with all national problems. We don't need a constitutional amendment nearly so much as we need some one to draw bills in accordance with the Constitution. You can't draw a bill on great subjects of this nature as you would draw a resolution for a town meeting. Let it be uderstood that the construction which the Supreme court has placed on the interstate commerce clause gives ample and complete and plenary power to deal with all matters of national concern."

IT WAS said in Washington that the President and his advisers had decided on their course in reforming the New Deal but would not announce it for a time. Meanwhile, according to the story, congress will be urged to pass makeshift legislation, to reinstate the code system by voluntary co-operation of business men, and to treat the labor problem by a law protecting any state from goods produced in other states under labor standards below its own. The states will be invited to make their own recovery laws and the federal government will assume the power of enforcing them.

Statesmen are trying to devise some way of centralizing the government without amending the Constitution. One suggestion, approved by a good many, is that congress deprive the Supreme court of appellate jurisdiction in cases involving wages and hours of labor, production, and various other fields in which the New Deal operates.

Mr. Roosevelt himself says that the Supreme court decision by implication cast serious doubt upon the validity of much New Deal legislation besides NRA, notably the agricultural adjustment act, the securities act and the securities and exchange act.

OFFICIALS of the United Mine Workers of America gave notice that approximately 450,000 miners in the soft coal fields would go on strike unless new wage contracts were signed before June 16. The members of the union were warned there must be no violations of the law nor any disturbances of the public peace during the strike. The entire soft coal fields of the United States is included, but not Canada.

A committee of the producers was trying to bring about a revision of the Guffey coal stabilization bill, hoping this would prove a satisfactory substitute for the NRA coal code and would avert the threatened strike.

THERE was great rejoicing in Racine, Wis., when the strike at the J. I. Case company plants was called off after lasting 80 days. The employees accepted the compromise offer of the company, whose payroll has been the largest in the city. In general the demands of the strikers were not met, though the company agreed to certain raises in piece and day wages. It promised to re-employ the men without discrimination as business conditions warrant.

ACTING with surprising suddenness, the senate passed the Copeland-Tugwell food, drug and cosmetic bill, which had been modified to meet the objections of Senators Clark, Bailey and Vandenberg. Doctor Copeland said he believed it would get through the house without difficulty. President Roosevelt favors the measure.

The bill greatly increases the scope of the 1906 food and drug act, in the definitions of adulterated or misbranded articles, and provides penalties of a year in jail or a $1,000 fine for violations.

ONE immediate result of the Supreme court's NRA decision was the dismissal of 411 cases involving NIRA, invalidated by the ruling. This action was taken by Attorney General Cummings with the approval of the President.

C. C. Davis

"All of these cases related to the enforcement of code or similar requirements, violations of fair trade practices on the part of individual business or failure to live up to minimum wage or hour standards," the official statement said. "There are, of course, a large number of additional cases in every state in which actual court action has not yet been initiated. These also, because of the Schechter case decision, must necessarily be dropped."

Chester C. Davis, AAA administrator, in reply to inquiries concerning future plans as to maintenance of marketing agreements and licenses, sent out the following telegram:

"The Agricultural Adjustment administration has no thought of abandoning either its present program of marketing agreements for fruits and vegetables or its milk-marketing plans. On the contrary, we are now working with congressional leaders on amendments designed to strengthen these marketing agreements and milk plans."

LITTLE George Weyerhaeuser, nine-year-old lumber fortune heir who was kidnaped from Tacoma, is safe at home, but the "snatchers" who held him captive for a week got away with $200,000 ransom money paid by the lad's family. They fled in a fast automobile, and at this writing are still at large, though pursued closely by an army of government agents and other officers. At last reports they were in the bad lands of Oregon.

FLOODS and tornadoes wrought havoc in Nebraska, Colorado, Wyoming, Texas and Kansas—a region that only recently was afflicted by drouth and dust storms. It was thought as many as 250 lives were lost, and great numbers of families were rendered homeless. The worst flood area was in southern Nebraska, where the Republican river was swollen into a raging torrent. Several entire villages were swept away, and utility plants and transportation lines were all washed out.

QUETTA, "garden city" of northwest India, and all the surrounding region were shattered by a series of earthquakes. The dead were estimated roughly at 30,000, but the exact number never will be known. The city and many villages were laid in ruins, and fire and flood swelled the toll of the killed and injured. The barracks of the royal air force at Quetta were demolished and more than fifty members of the garrison were killed. The city's police force was almost wiped out. While most of the victims of the disaster were natives, there were many English men and women among them.

BABE RUTH is out of baseball. The most sensational figure in the national sport during many years announced he had quit the Boston Braves, and soon thereafter Judge Emil Fuchs, president of that club, announced that Ruth had been released unconditionally. The Babe and the management of the Braves had not been in accord for some time, and the final break came when he asked for time off to meet the new French liner Normandie and was turned down.

U. S. COMBATING COUNTERFEITERS

Rapid Increase of Bogus Bills Causes Much Concern.

While the secret service, charged with protection of the currency of the United States, is always alert in the war against counterfeiters, present conditions have necessitated even greater vigilance.

Two factors have led to a substantial increase in counterfeiting. First, there was the repeal of prohibition, with a resultant seeking of other fields by bootleggers. Second, the depression has caused the reduction of the "market" for "suckers" in confidence-game manipulations, and therefore the necessity for the so-called "slickers" to turn to other methods of income. Acting Chief Joseph E. Murphy, of the United States secret service, says that, because of the peculiar economic conditions, counterfeiting is today on the high tide.

Great success, however, has attended the efforts of the secret service against the bogus-money entrepreneurs. The recent arrest in New York of Victor Lustig, alias "the Count," illustrates the thoroughness of the methods used.

Secret service records show that in April, 1927, the Count, who has a long police record in this and European countries, escaped from the Crown Point, Ind., jail. He turned to counterfeiting when he found other operations lacking in profits.

In December, 1933 investigation revealed that Lustig was interested in the output of counterfeit notes, some of which were found in the home of a Chicago printer named Davis. The search for the count extended into several states, and ended in his arrest in New York city, where he was picked up.

The trail terminated in a Times Square subway station locker. There police and federal agents discovered a collection of steel, copper and glass plates representing many types of government paper money.

Sometimes unusual methods are used in passing counterfeits. Recently, when a woman in New York, who owed a $2,500 mortgage, advertised in a newspaper to sell a bracelet and some diamonds, she was answered by facile-tongued crooks. They bought her jewelry for 22 $100 bills, which were bogus.

Dr. Robert H. Kennedy, surgical director of the Beekman Street Hospital of New York City makes a very worthwhile recommendation.

Dr. Kennedy suggests that all filling stations be designed as first aid stations for victims of automobile accidents. Dr. Kennedy states that when a fracture occurs between the joint and the ankle or between the shoulder and the middle of the forearm, the injury may be gravely aggravated by moving the patient without proper splinting.

First aid stations at strategic points would be a movement in the right direction.

H.O. Hanson, Editor and Publisher — Holt, Marshall County, Minnesota, Friday, June 28, 1935. — Volume 25, Number 9

20 Years Ago

Oscar Schenkey, John Nordlum and others from Middle River had a close call in auto spill at Anita on the ridge five miles southwest of Holt. It so happened that they came along at night on the old ridge road near the Soo Line gravel pit and the company had dug out the road as they owned the land but, had not put up any warning. The car rolled over once into the 15 foot pit and was badly damaged but the occupant escaped unhurt. Note: The editor of this paper now was at that time employed with the Soo Line and got instruction from the railway company to put up a good fence around the gravel pit to protect them against further accidents of this kind. The years go by.

Mud Lake Condemned

Practically every farmer in the Mud Lake area and surrounding territory were at Warren on Saturday to take in the hearing conducted by the state for condemning certain lands in this part of the county for a migratory wild fowl refuge. Appraisers will be appointed in a few days to go out and look over the land involved and make a report of its value.

There are really so many angles to the proposition of acquiring this land for the refuge that it seems to be the best policy right now to let the state go ahead and condemn it and pay the land owners a fair and just price for thier farms. It was brought out at the hearing by a government attorney that all those who are effected by this project will get a square deal all the way thru.

Look For New Weeds

Farmers are urged to send in samples of any unknown weeds which they may find on their farms. Creeping Jenny and Leafy Spurge, two of the worst weeds have been found in this county and neighboring counties. By locating the infested areas while they are yet small, proper methods of eradication can be worked out at a small cost.

In order to identify weeds it is suggested that samples be sent in to arrive at the County Agents Office not later than July 3rd.

Arrangements have been made for identification of weeds on the first day of the fair.

Bison Bones Shed Light on Earliest Americans

A spot in northern Colorado where Smithsonian institution scientists discovered ancient animal bones is believed to be the oldest habitation site in America, says Pathfinder Magazine. The bones have been identified as those of a species of bison which are thought to have followed closely upon the receding glaciers of the last Ice age and to have inhabited the North American continent at the same time as the mysterious "Folsom men." These men made odd-looking tools known as Folsom points, which have been found scattered widely over the continent and in connection with animal bones of great age. More detailed evidence of the race, however, has never been found. Scientists are, therefore, looking hopefully to this site with the expectation that it may throw light upon the nature and origin of this primitive American. The "Folsom man," ancestor of the American Indian, is believed to have come from Asia.

SYNOPSIS

Theodore Gatlin adopts a baby, "Penelope," in an effort to solve his matrimonial troubles. But his wife has never wanted her, and their affairs end in the divorce court. At a baseball game a ball strikes ten-year-old Penelope on the nose. Mrs. Gatlin spirits the child to Europe. Gatlin wills Penelope all his money, and is about to begin a search for her when a motor accident ends his life. Some ten years later, in San Francisco, Stephen Burt, rising young psychiatrist, is presented by Dan McNamara, chief of police, with a new patient—Nance Belden, a girl with a dual personality, for which her "saddle nose" is in part responsible. McNamara does not think she is a criminal and obtains Burt's testimony in court. Lanny, the doctor's office nurse, is also won over. Nance's criminal record outweighs Doctor Burt's explanation of her case and she is sent to San Quentin penitentiary. Nance escapes, and goes to Lanny's apartment. From one of the men in the boat on which the girl escaped McNamara learns that her real name is Penelope Gatlin. He also discovers that she is heiress to $750,000. Fearful of McNamara, in his official capacity, Nance flees. Lanny finds her in her apartment, asleep. Then she disappears, and McNamara learns that she is living in Paris. He also discovers he is in love with Lanny. Stephen warns Penelope by cable to leave Paris, as her whereabouts are known.

"Make up your mind now that you will never mention those two names again as long as you live. You promise?"

"Yes, Doctor."

"Now, what is the name of the girl whose photograph you showed me?"

A curious slight spasm of distaste flashed across Flynn's face. He shuddered. "I don't know," he replied.

"What is the name of the girl who escaped from San Quentin?"

"I don't know."

Stephen struck Flynn a smart slap on the top of the head. "Wake up," he commanded.

Flynn came awake instantly and looked extremely foolish. "Well, you didn't stand the test," Stephen assured him. "You were falling asleep, so I awakened you."

"Am I pretty bad, Doc?"

"You're this bad, that if you do not take treatment you will be in a bad way. I'll give you a prescription. Come and see me again."

"Thank you, Doc. You're mighty kind. Good Lord, Doc, am I going crazy? I don't remember why I called on you."

"You asked me to identify this passport photograph," and Stephen held out the little photo to Flynn, who thrust it away.

"That's bad luck, Doc. Never mind. It's a matter of no importance."

He picked up his hat, bade Stephen good night and left.

CHAPTER X

When the cablegram sent to Penelope Gatlin had been delivered for at least three days Dan McNamara telephoned Lanny to ask if the girl had answered. Upon being told she had not, he was so cast down that Lanny felt sorry for him. So, like all women who feel sorry for a man, she decided to feed him, and invited him for dinner that night. She said Stephen would be there.

"That's no inducement," McNamara rumbled, "but I'll come anyhow. Thanks."

McNamara's thoughts kept shuttling back to Penelope Gatlin all that busy day. Finally he telephoned Flynn to report to him.

"How about that Merton case I sent up to the chief of detectives recently?" he asked, when Flynn appeared. (McNamara hadn't sent the case up at all, but he knew Flynn did not know this.)

"Oh, yes," said Flynn, "I did some work on that but didn't get anywhere. I called on the Merton woman and tried to get her to identify the girl's photograph, but she wouldn't or couldn't."

"Did you get a line on the girl?"

"Sure. Traced her to an address in Paris."

"Under what name is she registered with the Paris police?"

"Chief, I can't just recall it."

"It was Penelope Gatlin, wasn't it?"

Flynn flinched a little. "I don't know."

"You're as bad as Mrs. Merton. What's the matter with you?"

"I don't know, Chief. I think we might as well drop the case."

"Very well, then, forget it, Pat. I was mildly curious, that's all." He dismissed Flynn. "By Jupiter, that fellow's getting too deep for me!" he soliloquized. And he telephoned the captain of detectives. "What about that case of the lost Merton heiress?" he demanded.

"We've dropped it on Flynn's advice."

McNamara grunted and hung up.

Lanny, wearing a kitchen apron, ceased cooking dinner long enough to let him in that night. Stephen had not yet arrived, so McNamara went out into the kitchen with Lanny, while he related the news regarding the common nuisance.

Lanny gazed upon him very benignly. "You're a good man, Dan McNamara. How come you've never married?"

"If I had, my mother would have lived with us," he declared. "How come you've never been married?"

Lanny sighed. "Nobody ever asked me."

McNamara sighed gustily. "My poor mother's very old and in bad health," he said.

"A man like you should have sons—fine, big, strapping, manly sons."

"How old are you, Lanny?"

"Forty-two."

"I'm forty-six myself." He sighed again. "You're a fine woman, Lanny—devil a finer. We might manage it."

"Manage what?"

"To put up with mother for the little time she has to live. God bless her."

"I never could stand a left-handed proposal, Dan." Lanny shook her head and gazed at him solemnly.

"Then here's my right hand on it, Lanny," and he laid his great right paw in hers. "If it's sons you'd have, you old darlin', 'tis little time we have to waste."

A faint flush came to Lanny's slightly faded cheeks. "What would Stevie do?"

"It's been my observation, Lanny, that a woman without something to occupy her mind is in a poor way. You could continue to look after the doctor's office."

"You've a good theory, Dan, but it lacks one ingredient."

"Name the lack and I'll get it."

"You're not in love with me."

"The h—l I'm not! You're like all the women—forever putting dogs in windows. I'm not used to passing words lightly on such a subject. Give me a yes or no answer."

"You great, lovable idiot!" Lanny yelled. Advancing swiftly upon the chief, she kissed his pompadour. "I'll risk your mother, Dan," she said softly. "All my life I've been looking for a man with a heart in his chest—and the day you first came into the office, with your big, swaggering way and your blarney and your air of owning the world, I—I wondered if you were married. I'm no longer young, Dan. I have peculiar ways and I'm bossy, too—"

McNamara drew her face down and kissed it. "What a blessing I'm used to that, Lanny, and have learned to be kind to the aged. Here, quit pulling my hair, woman."

The door bell began ringing.

"What's wrong with you, Lanny?" Stephen demanded when Lanny admitted him. "I rang half a dozen times."

"Do you good to wait once in a while," she snapped back at him.

"Mac," he declared, "you have a proprietary air about you."

"And well I may," McNamara replied pertly. "I've just popped the question to Lanny and we've agreed to jump over the broomstick together."

"I've been expecting this, Dan. She hasn't been worth a canceled postage stamp to me since she met you."

"But I'm not going to leave you, Stevie darling. Oh, I couldn't leave my boy!"

Stephen held out his arms and Lanny ran into them. And then Stephen warned Dan that if he wasn't good to Lanny he would hypnotize him, as he had hypnotized P. Flynn, and sell him the idea he was a pet poodle, so Lanny could kick him around at will.

"You what?" McNamara yelled. "You put the comether on Flynn?"

"Certainly." And Stephen told him the story.

"Three hundred years ago, in Salem, Massachusetts," said Dan McNamara, "you would have been burned for a witch."

The door bell rang insistently. "Now, who can that be?" Lanny exploded.

Dan rolled out of the kitchen and down the hall. Then Stephen and Lanny heard the door slammed violently; there was a scuffle, and something crashed to the floor.

He came into the kitchen a moment later, leading by her handcuffed wrist none other than Penelope Gatlin. "She wouldn't kiss me first," he announced, "so I put the cuffs on her—the little vixen."

"Oh, Lanny, you darling! And Stevie, you sweetheart!" Penelope cried, and extended her manacled arms. Lanny dodged in under them and folded the girl to her heart. "You next, Stevie," Penelope ordered, and obediently Stephen lowered his head and the looped arms came around his neck and drew his face down. "And now, Dan," the girl cooed, and turned her face upward.

McNamara laughingly uncuffed her.

"Why didn't you cable us?" Stephen demanded, a trifle severely.

"I adore surprises, that's why."

"Why did you come back?" McNamara demanded.

"The proper place to hide oneself is in the spot one is supposed to have fled from. Lanny, don't let them stand around staring at me and asking me questions," moaned Penelope. "I'm hungry and so tired. Can I have my same little bed tonight?"

"You can have anything and everything you want, my dear."

"I want Stephen," came the answer, faintly tired, and the girl went to him and leaned her sleek black head against his breast. "I've missed you so, Stephen."

Stephen held her close with his left arm, and his right hand came up and cautiously fingered her poor nose. "God's on our side, Lanny," he told his nurse. "Tomorrow I want you to arrange for a room in St. Dunstan's hospital. We'll get Boyd to operate."

"Please, Stephen, do I have to go away any more?" asked Nance.

"No, not any more, my dear."

"And you'll fix my nose? I wanted to have it done in Paris, but when you sent me that cablegram I couldn't, of course. Can I have just the nose I want, Stephen?"

"Yes, little wanderer. And when that's done you shall have the kind of home you want. You've been lost in the woods, poor babe, but I'll lead you out into the loveliest sunshiny meadow imaginable."

McNamara had, throughout this scene, felt a lump in his throat. He glanced at Lanny and saw the tears of sympathy in her brave, kindly eyes, so to avert a scene he growled huskily: "When do we eat?"

* * * * * * *

For the first time since Penelope Gatlin, alias Nance Belden, had come under his notice, Stephen Burt had a reasonable opportunity to examine the girl, when, following dinner at Lanny's house, Penelope, Lanny, Dan McNamara and Stephen retired to the drawing room. Despite the strain of her record-breaking journey from Europe, Penelope was not so tired that she wished to retire early. She joined in the general conversation, and Stephen noticed that she seemed inclined to be argumentative, but her arguments indicated no cogent thought; frequently she employed the patois of the underworld; her language was racy and idiomatic. He noticed that her laugh was sudden, loud—the laugh of a vulgarian. She was nervous; her hands twined and intertwined continuously, she moved about the room a great deal, and finally came to rest on Stephen's knees. She looked into his eyes searchingly for a long time and then said accusingly:

"You don't care for me."

"Why do you think that, Penelope?"

"Because nobody could love a girl with a nose like mine."

"Did you bring back the sketches that Parisian artist made of you?"

She bounced off his lap and hurried upstairs, to return presently with a portfolio filled with sketches. There was one crayon drawing of her as she was. A half dozen additional sketches were copies of the first, with the exception of the nose. The artist had fitted into her features a nose of his own design, and viewed in profile some of his creations lent to the girl's face an aspect of singular beauty and sweetness.

"I like this one best," Stephen decided. "The patrician nose does you justice. Going to come over tomorrow and give you the most searching physical examination you've ever had," he decided. He drew her over to him and kissed her on the cheek, paternally. "You're a nice, sweet, lovable girl, Penelope," he assured her as if she were a little girl, "and the shape of your nose isn't taken into consideration by the sort of people whose love and approval you desire. And you can get along very well without the love and approval of any other sort. Dan and Lanny and I all love you and we want you to love us. We're your only real friends and you wouldn't do anything to hurt us, would you?"

"I'd rather die, Stephen."

"Fine. You're tired now, so suppose you run upstairs to bed, and tomorrow, when you wake up, you'll be refreshed and happy and we'll be able to discuss the making over of this poor nose. Kiss us all good night."

Lanny Sighed. "Nobody Ever Asked Me."

Penelope dutifully obeyed, and as she was starting up the stairs Stephen said: "And don't forget to say your prayers."

She grimaced disdainfully. "You must think I'm a nut—saying my prayers. I've been prayed to death."

"By whom?"

"I don't know, but by somebody. It makes me ill."

"That was the subconscious revulsion to her adopted mother coming out," Stephen told McNamara. "Mrs. Merton has a strong religious mania. That girl's a mighty healthy specimen," he continued. "I noticed, when I was dressing the wound in her shoulder, that her skin is soft and silky, not rough and dry, as in the case of psychopathic personalities. Everything about her seems to indicate sound ancestry, and I'm more than ever convinced that her mental disturbance is not organic. However, that's a lead we can run down after we've fixed her nose."

The sad-looking man in the tenement area leaned over the banisters and caught the visitor before she could disappear down a hole in the staircase.

"I wonder," said the visitor indignantly, "the landlord doesn't do something to repair this deplorable building?"

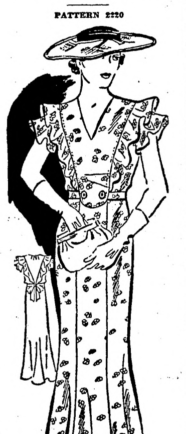
With the Always Popular Ruffles

PATTERN 2220



Perhaps the reason girls love ruffles is because men "adore" them. You'll be very definitely "dated" (in more ways than one) when you appear in Fashion's newest scoop—Double Tiered Ruffles—some Sunday afternoon! What more heavenly than 2220 made up in soft powder blue printed chiffon? That ruffle that starts and ends very conservatively at the waistline, looks its fluttery best at the shoulder with the help of the sleeve ruffle! A cool way to eliminate sleeve difficulty, too. The skirt takes just enough flare to give it graceful movement. Less expensive but just as lovely in organdy or sheer print cotton!

Pattern 2220 is available in sizes 14, 16, 18, 20, 32, 34, 36, 38 and 40. Size 16 takes 3½ yards 39 inch fabric. Illustrated step-by-step sewing instructions included.

SEND FIFTEEN CENTS (15c) in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for this pattern. Write plainly name, address, and style number. BE SURE TO STATE SIZE.

Address orders to Sewing Circle Pattern department, 243 West Seventeenth Street, New York City.

REPUBLICANS OF MIDWEST DENOUNCE ROOSEVELT IN "GRASS ROOTS" MEET.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© Western Newspaper Union.

THOUSANDS of Republicans from ten states of the Middle West gathered in Springfield, Ill., for the "grass roots" conference and, in the shadow of the tomb of Abraham Lincoln, who saved the Union, solemnly determined to save the "indestructible states" from what they consider an assault on their constitutional rights. The gathering was considered so important that it attracted political observers from all over the country. Most of the delegates were young men eager for the battle, but with them were many white-haired leaders of former frays whose enthusiasm and patriotism have survived the years.

Frank O. Lowden

After a pilgrimage to the New Salem State park where the scenes of Lincoln's youth have been reconstructed, the delegates assembled in the fair grounds Coliseum and were welcomed by George W. Bunn of Springfield, general chairman of the local committee. Harrison E. Spangler of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, was installed as temporary chairman and made a speech in which President Roosevelt was pilloried for all manner of political and governmental sins, from killing six million pigs and breaking campaign pledges to violating the Constitution and attempting to set up a dictatorship. Mr. Spangler then introduced the orator of the day, Frank O. Lowden, former governor of Illinois and former aspirant for the Republican Presidential nomination.

Mr. Lowden, breaking a political silence of seven years, vigorously denounced President Roosevelt's proposal to change the Constitution to fit the New Deal and argued at length for maintenance of the bill of rights unimpaired. Here are a few of his trenchant sentences:

"The essentials of our form of government are being challenged in high places."

"No crisis so grave as the present has confronted the people since the Civil war."

"If an amendment can be used to nullify a decision of the Supreme court upon a fundamental matter in one case, why can it not be employed in another?"

"Any attempt to rob America of its liberties would revive the spirit of '76."

"There is no room on American soil for the dictatorship of either the Fascist or the proletariat type of government."

"The preservation of the Constitution; this is the supreme issue of the hour."

At the Lincoln tomb later that day there were impressive ceremonies and a eulogy of Lincoln by Former Secretary of Agriculture Arthur M. Hyde of Missouri. Then in the evening two more notable addresses, by Mrs. George B. Simmons of Marshall, Mo., and John D. M. Hamilton of Topeka, national committeeman and permanent chairman of the convention.

The second day of the conference was devoted to speeches by Edward A. Hayes of Decatur, Ill., former national commander of the American Legion, and R. G. Simmons of Lincoln, Neb., and the consideration and adoption of a ringing set of resolutions.

ALMOST solidly the Democratic majority in the house voted for passage of the joint resolution extending the life of NRA in skeleton form until April 1, 1936. A few of them stood with the Republicans, but their fellows overrode all opposition with wild whoops and the vote stood 201 to 121. The balloting was preceded by a lot of noisy oratory which meant nothing.

In the senate the resolution was amended to prohibit voluntary trade agreements that offend against the anti-trust laws.

Immediately after the house had acted, it was announced at the White House that Donald Richberg would retire as chairman of the practically dead NRA on June 16, and that President Roosevelt had accepted his resignation "with great reluctance."

LONG ago the President said he was formulating a special message to congress on relief of the railways and federal regulation of all forms of transportation. This he finally sent in, asking for the following legislation at this session:

1. Amendment of the bankruptcy act of 1933 to facilitate financial reorganization of railways.
2. Regulation of air transport by the interstate commerce commission.
3. Regulation of highway motor carriers, provided for in a bill passed by the senate.
4. Regulation of intercoastal and coastwise trade and some inland water carriers.
5. Extension for one year of the office of federal co-ordinator of transportation and of the emergency railroad transportation act of 1933.

At the same time Joseph B. Eastman, federal co-ordinator of transportation, recommended to the railroads drastic changes in rate structures, schedules and types of equipment.

The changes, which Eastman termed "suggestions," were contained in a report which contains the findings of a two-year survey and which envisions a co-ordinated transportation system including all forms of transport—rail, water, motor truck, and pipe line.

Of outstanding interest was the suggestion for development of railway cargo operations and rates making possible profitable handling of trainloads of basic commodities without intermediate yardings and at greatly reduced rates.

CONGRESS, it now appears, will be in session until September, for the President handed to the leaders a "must" program of legislation that will keep the law makers busy for a long time. Here is the list:

1. Social security bill.
2. Omnibus banking bill.
3. Holding company bill.
4. Wagner labor relations bill, and Guffey coal regulations bill.
5. Tennessee valley bill.
6. Bankhead cotton act extension.
7. AAA amendments.
8. Tax extension bill.
9. Temporary NRA extension.
10. NRA government contract requirements.
11. Federal alcohol control legislation.
12. Federal oil control legislation.
13. Central statistical board set up.
14. Electrical farm and home autority set up.

The holding company measure has been resisted firmly in committee by two Democrats, Pettingill of Indiana and Huddleston of Alabama. In a senate debate it was vigorously attacked by Dieterich of Illinois, Democrat, and Hastings of Delaware, Republican, as an unconstitutional scheme to destroy the government's competitors in the power business. Mr. Dieterich said it was his honest conviction that the measure would destroy all private ownership of public utilities in the country, together with the millions upon millions of dollars invested in them by private citizens.

Thomas N. McCarter

This measure was naturally the chief topic of discussion at the annual convention of the Edison Electric Institute at Atlantic City. President Thomas N. McCarter told the assemblage that the privately owned power industry must fight for its life against the administration's "most devastating and destructive attack." He told of presenting "in person" to the President "a dignified memorial" setting forth "facts that seemed to the trustees to threaten the existence of this industry and appealed to the government for a get-together policy for the elimination of whatever abuses and wrongs might be found to exist," but said he got nowhere.

GREAT BRITAIN'S attitude toward the crisis in east Africa has enraged all of Fascist Italy and the attacks on England in the Italian press became so bitter that Mussolini had to order that they be toned down a little, though it was denied in Rome that the British had made any diplomatic protest. Il Duce, however, continues his outspoken denunciation of the British course. In a speech at Cagliari, the capital of Sardinia, he defied his European critics who have requested him to deal less harshly with the Ethiopians, and attacked the British without going to the trouble of hiding his words behind diplomatic formulas.

"We will imitate to the letter those who taught us this lesson," he shouted, referring to British colonizing methods which his press has been "exposing." "They have demonstrated that when they were creating an empire and defending it they never took into consideration world opinion.

"We have got old, and we have got new accounts to settle with Ethiopia, and we will settle them. We will pay no attention to what is said in foreign countries. We exclusively are the judges of our own interests and the guarantors of our future."

Actually, Mussolini's plans for war with Ethiopia are not very popular in Italy, but British interference is increasing his support daily. The reconstructed British cabinet is much worried over the situation and believes the war cannot now be stopped, though Sir Samuel Hoare, the new foreign minister, and Capt. Anthony Eden, who is now minister for League of Nations affairs, are doing what they can to avert it. It is expected the Italian offensive will begin within three months.

TWO of the kidnapers of young George Weyerhaeuser of Tacoma—Harmon M. Waley and his wife Margaret—were arrested in Salt Lake City, where the woman was passing $20 bills that were part of the ransom money. A third member of the gang, William Mahan, an ex-convict, was being hunted in the vicinity of Butte, Mont., in which he was forced to abandon a stolen automobile that contained $15,000 of the sum paid for release of the boy. Waley and his wife, heavily ironed, were subjected to a grueling examination by government agents and confessed their part in the crime.

GREECE has decided to remain a republic and the hopes of ex-King George that he might recover his throne are blasted. In the parliamentary elections a coalition of royalists and other parties was badly defeated, the Tsaldaris government winning 285 of the 300 seats contested. The monarchists were led by Gen. John Metaxis.

CRIMINALS MADE OVER PHYSICALLY WHILE IN PRISON

If your nose is crooked and you yearn to be an Adonis, or you have a twisted leg, and fain would walk like other men, then rob a gas station or forge a check, and when—or if—you get out of state's prison you may have a Greek profile and two perfectly good legs.

That is, if you remember to commit the crime in Connecticut. For they're doing remarkable things in the state prison at Wethersfield. As one convict puts it, with awe, "They're improving on the acts of God!"

John Dillinger, public enemy No. 1, had his face lifted, and there were streaming headlines across the nation's newspapers. But much more fundamental plastic surgery is being done, unnoted, behind the turreted walls down on Wethersfield Cove. Men leave the prison so changed that their best friends don't know them.

Of course, there's one fundamental difference—that Dillinger had his physiognomy made over by quacks, to avoid the law, whereas the man in Wethersfield is reconstructed by the law itself, in an attempt to obliterate those stigmata that label him convict.

Penologists may insist that the "babyface" is equally as likely to be a killer as is the man with the bashed-in nose and the prognathous jaw. But popular psychology still accepts ugliness as synonymous with turpitude, and distorted features as an indication of depravity. The man who is born with or acquires by accident the type of countenance that the law-abiding citizen associates with crime is licked before he starts. He looks like a criminal.—Marian Murray in the American Mercury.

Safetygrams

BY FRED W. BRAUN
The Safety Man

Do you know the terrific cost to the country in wage loss and medical expense as a result of motor vehicle accidents?

Motor vehicle accidents caused 36,000 deaths and 1.250,000 nonfatal injuries last year. The cost to the nation in wage loss and medical expense was approximately $780,000,000, To this might be added about $800,000,000 for property damage, giving grand total of $1,580,000,000.

This money could be saved the nation by the automobile drivers of the country. Never has the cost been so high. Sooner or later the average citizen is going to realize what this means in his taxation and public opinion will will then demand safe driving. Let us hope so.

Only a small crowd came out to hear the Holt Community Band at their concert last Thursday evening. The weather was too cold for outdoor comfort.

Marshall County Fair

Vieing with a colorful program of entertainment scheduled for the next two days, entries of exhibits in all departments at the Marshall County Fair which is now in progress at Warren indicate that the 1935 fair will be a record breaker in crowds, entertainment and education.

The bigger Marshall county fair opened Wednesday morning and bright and early, exhibitors from all parts of the county found their way to the fair grounds, bringing the best they have produced to fill every department of the fair. The ideal spring weather has been a boon to growing crops and as a result the grains, grasses and vegetable exhibit is outstanding.

4-H club members representing every club in the county were on hand bright and early with their carefully groomed stock, well prepared culinary and professional appearing sewing projects. The 4-H department at the fair is really the finest that it has been for several years and is well worth the time for a thorough inspection.

Marshall county will be given statewide recognition Friday afternoon when P. R. Fields, manager of the International Harvestor Company branch at Grand Forks, will present William Omundson, Warren 4-H club member with a $100 certificate as a reward for winning the Minnesota Farm Record account contest in 1934. The presentation will take place at two o'clock. Winners of the 4-H Club Showmanship contest will also be presented with their trophies during the afternoon.

The Friday afternoon program will feature Thrill Day at the Fair which will include daredevil motorcycle stunt riding, head-on collision, crashing through a board wall, and thrilling motorcycle races with well known professional riders entered. Lew Rosenthal's program of grandstand acts will also be a big feature of the afternoon.

Great interest is being taken by horsemen of Northwestern Minnesota in the Derby Day program for Saturday afternoon. The circuit race will have many entries from this section of the state who will compete for the $75 and added money purse. The pony race will have an entry limit to Marshall and Northern Polk counties.

Each evening Lew Rosenthal's Continental Revue with its colorful array of dancers, singers and comedians will entertain better than ever with a clever and clean program. This Revue will present a complete change of program nightly. Dancing will also be featured in the Wigwam, with old time dancing from 8:30 o'clock until 10 o'clock by local orchestras and after ten o'clock Fuller's Broadcasting Orchestra, who will play snappy modern music for the dance lovers of this section.

The fair is on - lets do our bit to make it the finest and best fair ever presented in Marshall county by attending. Remember children under 12 will be admitted free, while charges for grown-ups are reasonable. Take a day from your work and go to your Marshall County Fair at Warren Thursday, Friday, and Saturday. You'll enjoy every minute.

Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Knutson and son Harlan spent Sunday visiting at the Carl Surmo home at St. Hilaire.

Visited Folks In Canada

Mr. and Mrs. P. N. Pederson and family returned home a week ago from a long motor trip into western Sasketchewan, Canada. They visited with a number of relatives in thru the territory around Prince Albert. Mr. Pederson reported that they hit a lot of poor dirt roads in that country. He also stated the crops looked very good. When they were on their way home they came past a place where some cars cars were bunched up near a filling station at an intersection of the highway but they did not stop to investigate. When they arrived at the next town they heard that some of the people in the accidnnt were S. G. Svenkeson's father and brother. The young man died from the injuries received in the smashap and the senior Svenkeson was taken to a hospital but was found not so badly hurt.

Safetygrams

BY FRED W. BRAUN
The Safety Man

A person is more likely to die from accidental injuries than from any other cause. Industry, highway traffic, drowning, railroads and other factors contribute to the list of causes.

Somebody is killed every five minutes. The highways are becoming "slaughterways". When you sit down behind that wheel and drive, you, and only you, are responsible.

A worm turns deliberately in any direction without warning. So do a lot of automobile drivers. Wait until the "worm" turns, then go ahead. It's safer. Reckless or careless disregard for others must stop. If people are too old to learn about safe driving I would tell them that they are too young to die.

One million people are under sentence to die by accident during the next ten years. Don't you pass judgement on anybody.

Hail, Rain And Wind Storm

The weather has been of a rather rough variety here the past few days. We had a small shower on Sunday with real warm weather on Monday and Tuesday. Right after noon on Tuesday the weather calmed with a terrific heat wave which a little later broke out with a hard rain and some hail. It rained and hailed here in a mixture for about fifteen minutes. Farmers report that a loss of about five per cent was suffered by the crops in this vicinity. Gardens and flowers were hit quite hard but not enough to do much damage to their growth. Potatoes and corn fields were plastered to the ground more from the rain and wind than from hail.

Gun Club Entertained Here

The Holt Sportsmen's club treated the Newfolden Gum club to free supper at the Nazareth Lutheran church Monday evening. About fifty-seven members from the two clubs were in attendance. The officers of the Ladies Aid served them a very delicious meal. More about the doing will be told next week.

Rosewood Pioneer Died

Mary Shoberg a resident of this community for 53 years was called to her eternal rest on Sunday June 23 following a lingering illness caused by infected teeth resulting in the poisoning of her body.

Born in Orebro Lan Sweden on April 18, 1873 she was at her death slightly over 62 years old. In 1881 she came with her parents Mr. and Mrs. John Sor to America and was for a couple of years a resident of Ishpeming Mich., where her Dad was employed in the mines, and in 1883 they came to New Solum township to homestead the farm which has since been their home. Her father died in 1920 and her mother in the spring of 1933, and since that time she and her only son Joel been operating the home farm. Married in 1896 to Carl Sjoberg, a union that was shortly dissolved, she remained with the home folks with her boy.

The funeral was conducted last Thuraday afternoon from the Mission church near Rosewood. Rev. C.E. Anderson spoke the final rites. Interment was made in Wildwood Cemetery, located on the home farm.

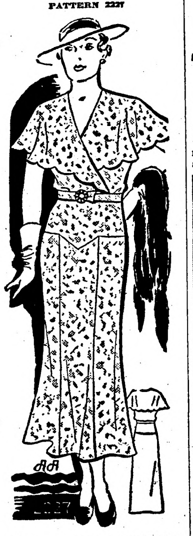
DEPEND ON CAPE TO SLENDERIZE

PATTERN 2227



The smart stout knows tight-fitting clothes only emphasize one's generous proportions, so she very wisely depends on capes to equalize proportions! The scalloped edge of this one lends welcome variety. Just to prove there isn't a slenderizing feature that's been overlooked, the dress adopts a surplice closing in a sweeping manner that makes the bust quite inconspicuous! The V shaped front skirt yoke and straight panels are in league to help "slim you down!" If you select a print-silk or cotton—be sure it's a small design. A big design would undo most all the good work we've done for you!

Pattern 2227 is available in sizes 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46. Size 36 takes 3⅞ yards 39 inch fabric. Illustrated step-by-step sewing instructions included.

SEND FIFTEEN CENTS (15c) in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for this pattern. Write plainly name, address, and style number. BE SURE TO STATE SIZE.

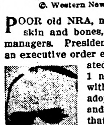
CURRENT EVENTS PASS IN REVIEW

NEW SET OF MANAGERS GIVEN NRA BY PRESIDENT WITH J. L. O'NEILL AS HEAD.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© Western Newspaper Union.

POOR old NRA, now just a thing of skin and bones, has a new set of managers. President Roosevelt issued an executive order extending the emaciated affair until April 1 next, in accordance with the resolution adopted by congress, and then announced that James L. O'Neill, vice president of the Guarantee Trust company of New York, would serve as administrator. Assisting the banker in the effort to persuade the public, business men and labor to abide voluntarily by the codes no longer enforceable, and in the assembling of statistics, are Leon C. Marshall, director of the division of review; Prentiss L. Coonley, director of the division of business co-operation, and George L. Berry, assistant to the administrator representing labor. Mr. Berry, who has been serving as a code administrator, is president of the International Pressmen's union and was once a candidate for nomination for Vice President of the United States.



G. L. Berry

O'Neill, Marshall and Coonley were made directly responsible to the President. An advisory council of six members was named to help them. On this council are Charles Edison and Howell Cheney for industry; William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, and Philip Murray, vice president of the United Mine Workers, for labor, and Emily Newell Blair and Walton H. Hamilton for consumers.

"The administration of the amended act," said the President in signing the orders, "will proceed as rapidly as possible to adjust activities and personnel to conform to present limited objectives.

"So long, however, as there is a possibility of further legislation, it will be desirable to maintain the general structure of the recovery administration in Washington and in field offices and to retain those essential members of a trained personnel who can be usefully employed. There will be lasting values in a careful appraisal of the two-year accomplishments of the NRA and in preserving for permanent use the records of that experience. This can be done by those heretofore engaged in the work of codification.

"A steady but gradual reduction of personnel is, therefore, a sound public policy which will also avoid imposing undue hardships on faithful public employees who can continue to render a service of exceptional value to the government. It will be necessary, of course, to retain a sufficient field force to report on the effects of code abolition. This will include information covering changes in labor and fair practice standards."

There are 5,400 employees of the NRA, 4,500 of them in Washington. Reduction of the personnel eventually to 1,500 is contemplated, but it is expected that most of the dismissed employees will be absorbed by other alphabetical agencies.

SENATOR HUEY LONG, the Louisiana Kingfish, made a tremendous effort to keep the senate from adopting the resolution extending the skeletonized NRA until next April, but failed. Advocating an amendment offered by Senator Gore, which would have required senate confirmation of all executive officials drawing more than $4,000 a year, thus disrupting the patronage machine, Huey started on a filibuster. For nearly 16 hours, with occasional help from Senators Schall and McCaren, he kept the upper house in session, pouring forth a continuous stream of discourse that ranged from the necessity of preserving the Constitution down to recipes for fried oysters and pot-likker.

Senator Long

At last the senate broke down the filibuster, rejected the Gore amendment and passed the extension resolution by a vote of 41 to 13. One change, to tighten up the antitrust laws, suggested by Borah, was made, so the resolution was sent back to the house for concurrence.

EWING Y. MITCHELL, one of the original Roosevelt men in Missouri, was rewarded by appointment as assistant secretary of commerce, but he violently opposed some of Mr. Roper's policies in the running of the department and so the President, after asking in vain for his resignation, ousted him summarily, saying he desired for the position "a man of large executive and administrative training." Now Mr. Mitchell has started what he calls "a fight to a finish," opening with the publication of charges that "special interests" dominate the Commerce department. He especially criticizes a government contract with the United States lines for the permanent layup of the steamship Leviathan, contending it is against the public interest and that "those interested in the company, prominent among whom are P. A. S. Franklin, John M. Franklin, Vincent Astor and Kermit Roosevelt," stood to benefit by it.

The bureau of air commerce and the steamship inspection service also came in for unfavorable criticism by Mr. Mitchell.

ACCORDING to reports issued by the Brookings institution, there is no justification for indefinite continuance of the wheat and tobacco programs of the AAA.

The wheat report, written by Joseph S. Davis, a director of the food research institute of Stanford university, warns against a tendency to spread a sinister form of political corruption. It credits progress in raising prices and reducing surplus largely to two successive years of drouth and lists contributory causes as the influence of the tariff and dollar depreciation.

The tobacco report by Harold B. Rowe states that substantial benefits have been obtained for growers with little, if any, added burden on consumers through higher prices thus far. No attempt is made to appraise the merits of the program as a public policy, although it is pointed out that benefits to producers could not be increased indefinitely.

SECRETARY OF WAR DERN exonerated Maj. Gen. Benjamin D. Foulois of blame for the army air-mail fiasco and merely directed that he be reprimanded for making "inexact, unfair and misleading" statements to the house military affairs committee. This didn't suit certain members of the committee who insist the general should be removed from his command of the army air corps. Representatives William H. Rogers of New Hampshire and Lister Hill of Alabama said they would carry the matter to the floor of the house and there review the evidence the committee took.

Gen. Foulois

In holding that Foulois should receive more drastic punishment than a reprimand, Representative Rogers made public a letter from Secretary Dern to the committee. The letter followed an official War department statement clearing Foulois, whose friends insisted he was being made a scapegoat for the administration air-mail blunder.

"It is affirmatively established," Dern's letter read, "that General Foulois violated the ethics and standards of military service in making statements before your committee which not only were unfair and misleading to the committee itself but which also reflected upon the integrity of his brother officers."

AFTER three bloody riots in Omaha's street car strike, in which one man was killed and nearly two hundred were injured, Gov. R. L. Cochran of Nebraska took charge of the situation. State troops were called out to preserve the public peace and the governor, meeting with representatives of the traction company, the central labor union and the strikers, ordered that the dispute be arbitrated immediately.

Cochran insisted the arbitration agreement be effective for at least one year and hinted his military authority might be invoked to enforce the agreement during that time.

"If either party," his statement said, "in the future fails to observe the conditions set down by the board of arbitration and so is responsible for a return of conditions which will again require military law it must take the full responsibility."

Illinois National Guardsmen were sent to Freeport where strikers at the Stover Manufacturing plant had fought with deputy sheriffs. Gov. Henry Horner intervened and a basis was reached for settling the strike, which had been in force since May 7. The men were granted a wage increase at least until September 1 next.

President Roosevelt succeeded in averting the threatened strike of bituminous coal miners. Both the operators and the United Mine Workers agreed to a truce until June 30, before which time it is hoped a new wage scale can be formulated and accepted.

EDWIN P. MORROW, former governor of Kentucky and a Republican leader prominent in state and nation, died suddenly in Frankfort. He was one of the most popular men in Kentucky and was noted for his oratorical powers.

Another death widely mourned is that of Gaar Williams, whose cartoons had endeared him to countless thousands because of their kindliness, humor and truth.

PLANS for spending the $4,000,000,000 work-relief fund are coming to the fore rapidly and numerously. Representative Mitchell, Democrat, of Tennessee, has introduced a bill requiring the President to use $1,000,000,000 to help the durable goods industries. By its terms factories supplying machinery and materials would be reimbursed for losses directly attributable to hiring new men. Mr. Mitchell thinks his plan would aid in the production of $80,000,000,000 worth of durable goods needed by private industry.

The War department filed a request for $17,071,388 to finance the construction of 36 army bases in Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, California and Kansas. The Labor department asked for $400,000 for research designed to aid the United States employment service in selecting and placing workers on relief jobs and in private industry.

Detroit Lakes—Discovery of the skeleton of Indian quintuplets is claimed here. Authorities said they are convinced that a group of five skeletons of infants, uncovered by road crews represented quintuplets in some Indian family. Identical similarities in bones were pointed out in the theory these were Sioux or Chippewa quints. The Indian mound was opened in the path of a new road along Detroit Lakes.

St. Paul—The ouster suit aimed at Governor Olson was thrown out of court by Judge H. D. Dickinson. The action came after four days of testimony which revolved largely about the sentiments and background of the 29 signers of the petition asking the removal of the governor on charges that he had violated the corrupt practices act. A crowded court-room broke into cheers and applause when Judge Dickinson announced his verdict from the bench. His decision sustained a motion for dismissal, made by attorneys for the governor, who declared that the testimony had not established a cause for action.

WHY FIRST DAY IS LORD'S DAY

Gradually Supplanted the Jewish Sabbath.

Adoption of Sunday as the Christian Sabbath was gradual. The word Sunday, which occurs nowhere in the Bible, is derived from Anglo-Saxon sunnandaeg, day of the sun, the first day of the week having been dedicated to the sun by the pagans. The fourth commandment—"Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy"—referred to the ancient Jewish Sabbath, which was the seventh day of the week. That the New Testament writers clearly distinguished between the Sabbath and the first day of the week is shown by several passages in which the first day is mentioned as following the Sabbath. Although Jesus himself observed the Sabbath, St. Paul seems to have placed observance of this day among the customs not obligatory on Christians. He says in Colossians 2:16: "Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of an holy day, or of the new moon, or of the Sabbath days." This passage has been taken to indicate that the question of the Christian's relation to the Jewish Sabbath was raised at an early date, although it is not certain that the passage refers to the weekly Sabbath. From the beginning many Christians commemorated the first day of the week as Resurrection day, the day on which Jesus rose from the dead. "Lord's day" first occurs in Revelation 1:10. I Corinthians 16:2 seems to imply some sort of observance of the first day of the week. There is evidence that the first day was originally intended as a substitute for the Jewish Sabbath, but it seems that most of the early Christians observed both the Sabbath and the Lord's day, and this was the tendency as long as the Christians were composed chiefly of former adherents of Judaism. In the First century St. Ignatius wrote that Christians no longer observed the Sabbath, but the Lord's day instead, and St. Justin, in the Second century, was probably the first Christian writer to refer to the Lord's day as Sunday. As centuries passed and the church grew in strength the majority of Christians paid less attention to the Sabbath and more attention to the Lord's day until in time the Lord's day or Sunday supplanted the Sabbath in their eyes.—Indianapolis News.

Hawk "Muscles In"

"Muscling in" is not unknown among birds of prey. Ranger-Naturalist H. B. Mills of Yellowstone National park tells this tale of a hawk, an owl and a mouse:

"The course of the owl over the wet meadow was suddenly cut short by a quick dive into the grass. A marsh hawk, unseen heretofore, came at the owl full speed ahead, knocked it from its position and searched in the grass where the owl struck. Neither bird caught anything, and in a moment they were both on the wing again.

"The owl, not greatly nonplused, struck into the grass again in a few minutes. The hawk was again on him, and this time with more success. The owl had caught a meadow mouse, and the hawk ate it for him, or more truly, a part of it, for we frightened him away before he was through."—Kansas City Times.

SYNOPSIS

Theodore Gatlin adopts a baby, "Penelope," in an effort to solve his matrimonial troubles. But his wife has never wanted her, and their affairs end in the divorce court. At a baseball game a ball strikes ten-year-old Penelope on the nose. Mrs. Gatlin spirits the child to Europe. Gatlin wills Penelope all his money, and is about to begin a search for her when a motor accident ends his life. Some ten years later, in San Francisco, Stephen Burt, rising young psychiatrist, is presented by Dan McNamara, chief of police, with a new patient—Nance Belden, a girl with a dual personality, for which her "saddle nose" is in part responsible. McNamara does not think she is a criminal and obtains Burt's testimony in court. Lanny, the doctor's office nurse, is also won over. Nance's criminal record outweighs Doctor Burt's explanation of her case and she is sent to San Quentin penitentiary. Nance escapes, and goes to Lanny's apartment. From one of the men in the boat on which the girl escaped McNamara learns that her real name is Penelope Gatlin. He also discovers that she is heiress to $750,000. Fearful of McNamara, in his official capacity, Nance flees. Lanny finds her in her apartment, asleep. Then she disappears, and McNamara learns that she is living in Paris. He also discovers he is in love with Lanny. Stephen warns Penelope by cable to leave Paris, as her whereabouts are known. She flees before the French police get on her trail, and pops back into Lanny's home in San Francisco.

"We'll not fix it in this city, my boy." Thus McNamara.

"Why not?"

"Because when that girl is well she'll probably elect to live her life here, and I don't want a soul in this city, with the exception of ourselves, to know that once she had a saddle nose and a dual personality."

"We can trust the ethical integrity of the man I purpose—"

"I'll trust nobody but myself—and then not too much. Where is the best plastic surgeon in this country?"

"In New York city."

"Lanny, I'll ask the police commission for a sixty day leave of absence. We'll be married at once and take this child to New York with us, put her in a hospital there and have the job done. While it's being done we'll have our honeymoon."

"Three is a crowd—on a honeymoon," Stephen warned.

"It's nothing of the sort," Lanny defended. "Stevie, you mind your own business. Dan and I know our way about."

"Indeed? Well, just because you're so contumacious, I'm going to tell you something. If I hadn't promoted this engagement, you and Dan would not now be engaged. Dan had you up on a pedestal—which is where you never belonged—and you're so naturally man-shy you never even learned the rudiments of the come-on as practiced by the dullest, so I talked the matter up!"

"You didn't talk it up to me."

"No, but I listened sympathetically when you raved about what a grand man Dan McNamara was, and my neck is still stiff from nodding agreement. I told Dan you were crazy about him and worked up his courage—"

"You're a liar," McNamara charged, feebly and without malice.

"Dan McNamara is one man who doesn't have to have help with his courage or thinking," Lanny declared pridefully. "And you do, Stephen Burt. You're adept at lording it over your befuddled patients, but Rebecca P. Lanning is a horse of another color."

"I think I'll go home," Stephen retorted, and went.

He was back in the morning with the impedimenta of his profession. Penelope greeted him gravely. "Good morning, Doctor Burt."

He started. The strident note of Nance Belden was gone from her voice. She spoke now in the low, level tone of the girl of breeding. Then she sat down, and they conversed for half an hour on topics of general interest, but during that time she did not move once from her seat. Her vocabulary was free of underworld expressions, her diction perfect, her sentences grammatical.

"You have had a good night's rest, Miss Gatlin," he ventured.

She nodded, smiling a little. "I am not at all nervous this morning, Doctor Burt. When I am very tired, or excited about something, I am always horribly nervous."

"And you get dreadfully depressed, do you not?"

She nodded. "So depressed that at times I want to die."

"Well, we might as well start your physical examination. I'm going to try to ascertain why you can't be cheerful always. There's a reason, of course, for your nervousness and depression, so I want to examine you very meticulously and see if your trouble can be charged up to some physical condition. Let me feel your pulse."

It was eighty-three, full and strong. Stephen's examination of the girl was as complete as modern medical science could make it, and when the last laboratory report came in three days later he called Lanny in to discuss the girl.

"With the exception of a subnormal chest expansion, Lanny, that girl is without doubt the healthiest young woman I have ever examined. Her sole physical defect is her nose. But for that I think she'd be a husky little athlete right now. She told me she always wanted to excel in tennis, golf and dancing—well, of course she'd want to excel in something. She couldn't compete in good looks. I'll write up my report on her and you can hand a copy of it to the man who is to do the operation. I've wired him that I was sending on a patient, and he has agreed to care for her. I see by this morning's paper that Mac has been given a leave of absence."

Lanny nodded.

"When are you and Dan to be married?"

"Tomorrow. We're flying to Reno to avoid the three-day notice of intention to marry demanded by the California law."

"Penelope flying with you?"

"Naturally. She's my bridesmaid!"

"Who's going to give the bride away?"

"Nobody. Dan and I are too old to stand for a long-drawn-out marriage ceremony."

"Well, I suppose I'm stuck for a wedding present. How much money have I got in the bank?"

"Approximately twenty thousand. I'm going to buy you some Argentine bonds today. There's no reason why those bonds shouldn't be selling at—"

"Lanny, you're mercenary. I don't care for a dissertation on bonds. Draw yourself a check for ten thousand and spend it all in riotous living. Give old Dan a real blow out—"

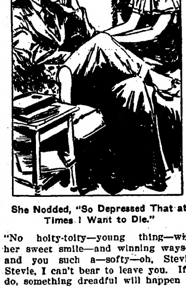
"Stevie, you're mad!"

"Quiet, please. Love from the boss, Lanny, and no back talk from you. And for heaven's sake do get a half-way intelligent nurse to take your place while you're away."

"I've engaged Miss Ordway."

"Horrible. Her face would stop a parade. She's efficient, but terrible to look at."

The tears were welling in Lanny's eyes. "Oh, Stevie, I want you to be safe—while I'm away," she choked.



She Nodded, "So Depressed That at Times I Want to Die."

"No holty-toity—young thing—with her sweet smile—and winning ways—and you such a—softy—oh, Stevie. Stevie, I can't bear to leave you. If I do, something dreadful will happen to you." And Lanny laid her head on her desk and sobbed quite heartily.

However, Stephen knew what was good for Lanny. "You make me ill," he said coldly. "You carry on like a girl of sixteen."

Instantly Lanny was furious. "You don't appreciate me," she charged.

"Be still. Where's the check book? On an occasion such as the present I suppose I should sign the check myself."

"It wouldn't do any good if you did, darling. You've never registered your signature at your bank and you have no authority to sign checks on your own bank account. How funny!" and Lanny commenced to laugh. "How lucky I thought of that before leaving!"

Thereupon Stephen put both arms around her and kissed her three times and told her she was as the shadow of a rock in a weary land; that she was very dear to him; that whatever she did was O. K. with him and he'd miss having his daily fight with her; and finally so softened her that she consented to let him fly to Reno and give the bride away. It developed that she had always wanted him to do this but loathed putting him to so much trouble.

At the expiration of his leave McNamara returned to duty, but Lanny remained with Penelope in New York. Performed by a master, the operation had proved successful thus far. The actual work of the operation had been the least of it; the subsequent care of the bone and skin graft, and the surgeon's artistry in reshaping the nose were what required time and patience. Lanny reported that the patient would not be discharged for at least three months more.

"How did Penelope approach the operation?" Stephen queried of McNamara.

"Happily. Not a whit nervous. Lanny had complete control over her." He grinned. "I passed as her Uncle Dan and the wife as Aunt Lanny. Lanny saw to it that the girl didn't do any talking while the doctor was present."

"You're a good fellow, Dan."

"Well," McNamara admitted humorously, "it wasn't much of a honeymoon, I'll admit. However, we'd set our hands to the job and we couldn't turn back, God help us."

"Well, you have this consolation, my friend. Your job is over, and mine will commence when Lanny returns with the girl."

"D'ye think you can pull her through, lad?"

"I'm sure I can, Dan. A psychoneurosis generally is impossible to cure unless you know its causative factors and can remove them. If you can do that, it's as simple as removing a wart. Dan, have you looked up the girl's ancestry?"

"I have not."

"Then do so immediately. We might run into a situation that will shed a bright, effulgent beam of light on my job."

"The attorney that handled Gatlin's affairs ought to be a good man to start with, Stephen. I'll motor to San Jose tomorrow and look him up. The bank will know who he is."

The bank president did know the name of the attorney, but added the disconcerting information that the man had been dead six years. McNamara thereupon called the man's widow to ask if she still retained her late husband's files. He had a faint hope that if she would permit him to look into the Gatlin file he might find a clue. He was informed to his amazement, that about two years and a half before, Mrs. Merton had called upon her, asked for the file and had been given it.

There was but one club in the city—the Elks—and McNamara wondered if Theodore Gatlin had belonged to that. He discovered Gatlin had, and from the dining room steward, who remembered Theodore Gatlin very well, he ascertained the names and addresses of three men with whom Gatlin had according to the steward, seemed very friendly.

Of these three men, one was dead and the others were unable to shed any light upon the parentage of Gatlin's adopted daughter, although one man had a hazy recollection that the child's father had been an army officer and had been killed in the Philippines. The chief's questionings, however, elicited the names of two women who had been friendly with Mrs. Gatlin, so McNamara called upon both. They could furnish him no information beyond the fact that Mrs. Gatlin despised the child Penelope; that she had never been enthusiastic about the adoption; that she had never been kind to the girl; that Gatlin and Penelope had been inseparable pals. They had a feeling that Mrs. Gatlin, while apparently delighting in persecuting her husband, was, nevertheless, insanely jealous of his love for his adopted daughter; that up to the day of her accident, Penelope had been a bright, healthy, normal child, fun-loving and affectionate and humorous, and the delight of her foster father.

CHAPTER XI

Dan reported to Stephen, somewhat depressed, because he had returned, he thought, without a scintilla of worth-while information. Stephen, however, thought otherwise. "I'll have to question Mrs. Merton again," he decided. He rang for Miss Ordway. "Telephone to Mrs. Merton," he ordered, "and tell her I wish she'd drop in here some day soon. Tell her I'd like the latest report on her health."

"What are you going to do?" McNamara asked.

"Hypnotize her again, of course. I've got to release her from the mental inhibition I set upon her in the case of her adopted daughter. Otherwise she'll not talk."

A minute later Miss Ordway entered the room. "Mrs. Merton says she will be down for her interview in half an hour, Doctor."

"When she arrives, Dan, you step out into the nurse's office until I have her under control; then I'll admit you. I want you to take copious notes."

Mrs. Merton fluttered into Stephen's consultation room forty minutes later. "Oh, Doctor Burt," she whined, "I'm so glad you've sent for me. My insomnia is worse than ever," she wailed. "Oh, Doctor, do you think I'm going crazy?"

"Not at all, not at all," he soothed her.

"You are excited over nothing. But you are in a highly nervous condition, of course, and until you have settled down it would be useless for me to attempt to examine you. If you could have a little nap for, say half an hour on the couch in the next room, I'm sure you would awaken much refreshed."

"Oh, if I could only sleep half an hour, Doctor, if I only could. What a relief it would be."

"Nonsense, my dear lady. We doctors have ways of inducing sleep even in the most obstinate cases of insomnia."

At his command she lay down on the couch and Stephen place a cushion under her head. Employing the appropriate method of inducing hypnotic sleep, Stephen had her drowsy within three minutes; in ten minutes she had passed into a profound state and Stephen summoned McNamara, gave him a pad and pencil and silently indicated a chair.

Mrs. Merton, however, was aware of his presence. "Who's there?" she demanded in a drowsy tone.

"Doctor McNamara, Mrs. Merton. I have called him in to confer with me on your case."

Character in the Signature

One's Written Name Discloses Personality When Placed on Letter or Document; Legibility First Thing to Be Given Consideration.

There is one thing which every person who can read and write should learn to do well, and that is to write his, or her, signature clearly and attractively. It is worth while to experiment in writing the name until it can be done in the best possible way. Then, when once you are satisfied you have found the right way, keep practicing it until it becomes a habit to write this particular form. Then this becomes your signature. It represents your personality when signed to letter, deed, etc. It does not vary in form, although ink and pen may be different. Of course, every one writes best with the accustomed style of pen, but the form of the signature remains the same, whatever the pen or whatever the ink, or pencil.

The first thing to strive for is legibility. Be assured that whoever sees your signature knows immediately what it spells. Let it stand distinctly for you, and it acquires an element of individuality. It has distinction as well as being distinct. It represents personality.

After legibility is assured, grace in letter formation is a desirable addition. Try to have all letters slant in parallel way whether back-hand, forward or upright. See that they are firmly set, not uncertainly. The stroke may be broad, as is usual with a stub pen, or delicate, as is equally usual with a fine spencerian pen. But it is not a matter of size of stroke but of certainty, of precision. A wavering handwriting indicates fear, weakness, or frailty. A sick or aged person whose strength is small cannot avoid uncertainty of line. The well and strong should not show signs of weakness in signatures, and most assuredly one does not wish to betray weakness of character in his very handwriting.

Try to make an attractive signature of the letters and words comprising your name. It no longer requires flourishes, as in old-time beautiful writing of names. Flourishes are out of style. Legibility, fine formation of letters and words, and good spacing of words comprising one's name are criterions of fine signatures. Children learn to write, but it is adults who perfect their own signatures. Banks and other firms with whom you do constant business get to know the signatures of their depositors and clients. It is a protection to have a representative signature. The better it is in appearance the more pleasing a personality it betokens.

TIRES MAY LOOK ALIKE ON THE OUTSIDE ON THE INSIDE THEY ARE DIFFERENT

HEAT on the inside created by friction is the main cause of blowouts. Firestone Tires are different on the inside—they are built with the patented extra process of Gum-Dipping that soaks every cord and insulates every strand with pure liquid rubber, preventing internal friction and heat. No other make of tire is Gum-Dipped.

Firestone performance records again emphasize the undisputed evidence that Firestone Tires are not only blowout-proof, but give greatest protection against skidding. There are three questions and answers that will solve the problem of what tires to buy:

QUESTION 1—"Will the tread give me the greatest traction and protection against skidding?"

ANSWER—Recent tests by a leading University show that Firestone High Speed Non-Skid Tires stop a car 15% quicker than any other of the leading makes. For eight consecutive years Firestone Tires have been on the winning car in the dangerous Pike's Peak Race where a skid means death. This is undisputed evidence that Firestone gives car owners greatest protection against skidding.

QUESTION 2—"Are they blowout-proof?"

ANSWER—Firestone Gum-Dipped Tires have the most amazing records for being blowout-proof of any tires ever built. In the gruelling 500-Mile Race at Indianapolis, May 30th, every one of the 33 cars was equipped with Firestone Gum-Dipped Tires. Not one of the 33 drivers had any tire trouble of any kind.

Ab Jenkins drove his 5,000 pound car on Firestone Gum-Dipped Tires over the hot salt beds of Utah, 3,000 miles at 127.2 miles per hour, with temperatures as high as 120°, without tire trouble of any kind. These are most amazing proofs of blowout protection ever known.

QUESTION 3—"Without sacrificing these two important safety features will they give me longer mileage, thus making them the most economical tires I can buy?"

ANSWER—Firestone High Speed Tires not only give you more than 50% longer wear, but also lowest cost per mile due to the tough, wear-resisting tread built with higher shoulders and a wider, flatter contour. This rugged tread is held securely to the Gum-Dipped cord body by Firestone's patented construction of two extra layers of cords under the tread, a special construction feature not used in any other tire. Unequaled mileage records by thousands of car owners add undisputed evidence of longer wear and greater economy of Firestone High Speed Tires

You Always Get Better Quality at No Higher Price when You Buy a Firestone Tire with the Firestone Name and Guarantee

1 University tests show Firestone Tires stop cars 15 to 25% quicker
2 Gum-Dipped cords give greater blowout protection. Gum-Dipping is not used in other tires.

Electric Storm-Heavy Rains

Rain! Rain! Did you say rain? The past week we have had all kinds of rain. On the 4th of July a heavy rain and terrific wind storm hit this community in the afternoon.

SILO BLOWN DOWN

The good silo on the Arno Steinhauer farm was blown over and wrecked when a twister hit his farm on the fourth.

Sunday we got some rain and Monday some more. Wednesday it set in with a good drizzle so we kept wet.

Early yesterday morning we were about to take a last look at things. A heavy electric storm struck here and believe u me she hit hard. Those whom slept in steel beds claim they were jolted by the lightning.

And sheets, streams, oceans of rain fell in connection with the load cracks and blue streak. Everything is full of water now.

Returned From Trip West

Mr. and Mrs. Chas Skoglund and sons returned home last week from a trip out west to the Yellowstone National Park, a visit with relatives at Salt Lake City, Utah and a trip to the Black Hills in South Dakota.

Arcording to reports the from farmers, alfalfa and sweet clover that had been cut a week ago and laid out in all the rain is gone lost. The second crop is coming so fast that it burns up in spots where the first cut hay is windrowed or bunched. Several hundred tons have spoiled in this community.

Bargains On Land Taxes

Taxes for the years 1930 and earlier may be paid at a reduced rate, specified in an act of the last legislature, begining August 12 and continuing until June 30, 1936, County Auditor Levi G. Johnson has announced.

Lists of the properties in Marshall county on which taxes are delinquent for the year 1930 and previous have been drawn up by the Marshall county auditor and notices will be served on each property holder by sheriff's officials. Lands on which the taxes are not paid one year after the date of service of the notice, will revert to the state and there will be no further opportunity for redemption.

The lands are those on which taxes are delinquent and where taxes have not been bought up by private purchasers.

On 1929 and 1930 taxes, settlement may be made for 80 per cent; taxes dating back to 1927 and 1928 may settled for 60 per percent; those delinquent since 1925 and 1926 for 50 per cent; those pending from 1923 and 1924 for 33⅓ per cent up to 1925 and those for all prior years for 20 per cent.

Tornado Does Big Damage

The tornado that passed over the country in and around Crookston the 3rd of July did a lot of damage. The town of Eldred south of Crookston was almost laid to ruins and several people were hurt and some were killed. Near Marcoux Corner south of Red Lake Falls many nice barns were torn down and trees and crops hurt. John Farden, pioneer farmer near Mentor, and his hired man were killed when they went up in the barn to close the big door in the hay loft. The roof of the barn was torn loose and crashed down on them. The school house in Mentor had one of the corner rooms blown right out of the brick building.

One of the largest crowds that have come to a dance here for some time, were in on Saturday evening to attend the free wedding dance given by Mr. and Mrs. L. Melroy Aase.

Services at the Pioneer School house on Friday evening, July 12. Singing by Miss Hanson and Miss Cornelius. Preaching by Arvid Folden.

Bible School program at Pioneer School house on Sunday July 14 in the evening. Misses Hanson and Cornelius, teachers.

If you are looking for good farms come to this community. Call at the News Office and we will let you know who the parties are that want to sell land, stock, machinery and all. Some will sell now with a good crop on the farm.

Historical Picnic Sunday

The second annual picnic of the Marshall County Historical Society will be held at the Big Woods Landing on the bank of the Red River Sunday afternoon July 14th. The entire county participates in this event and a large crowd is expected for it.

Dr. Theodore Blegen of Minneapolis has been engaged as speaker and according to the local chairman, Rev. M. Bratrud of Oslo, other interesting numbers will be on the program. Dr. Blegen has been president of the State Historical Society for many years and has been an active member of national historical societies as well. He is instructor in history at the University of Minnesota where he has become well known as a leading historian of our state.

The program begins at 2 p. m. with a concert by the Warren Band under the direction of Prof K. Kiland of Warren. Dr. Blegen is scheduled to speak at 3 p. m. and following his address there will be vocal selections by the Big Woods ladies sextet, a discription of a prairie fire, and recollections of early days by a local speaker.

The Big Woods Landing is a place of great historic interest as here a ferry was run between the Minnesota and the North Dakota side. An elevator there received wheat from the surrounding community and loaded it onto barges on the river. These barges held 1000 bushels each and were sometimes 11 in a group drawn by a steam tug. A store and post office stood near the ferry and also a saw mill that had been built to saw the logs taken from the big timber along the Red River.

A large picture is being painted by a local artist of the ferry, the elevator, the steamboat, and barges. This picture will be exhibited at the picnic July 14. It will be presented for permanent possession onto the Marshall County Historical Society.

The Big Woods Lutheran Ladies Aid will give a real wool carding and spinning demonstration before and after the program. Every year spinning bees are held in the Big Woods community and many of the women are expert spinners. They will have a stand where the usual Norwegian dishes will be served.

The picnic gronnds are easily reached by the gravel road one mile east and seven miles north of Oslo, Minn.

Olaf Ness and Chris a Saustad attended a truck line hearing at Crookston on Wednesday. They were there in the interest of the interest of the Great Northern Railway Company who where fililing a protest to the application of the Yankee Truck Line company who wanted to start a line up this way to Warroad.

—24—

"You are so kind, Doctor Burt," she said.

He resumed his passive stroking of her forehead and cheeks; in a low, monotonous tone he commanded her to answer all his questions. Then suddenly:

"Have you thought of your daughter, Penelope, of late?"

Grimace of distress flitted across the beautiful face. "No distress or bad luck will attend the thinking while you are with me, understand? I command you to think about her—to remember her and to answer truthfully all my questions regarding her."

"Yes, Doctor."

"Why did you and Mr. Gatlin adopt her?"

"He wanted a baby and I couldn't give him one."

"Could you, if you had cared to?"

"Yes, Doctor." Her tone was very peevish.

"How old was she when you adopted her?"

"About a month."

"Where did you find her?"

"In the Infants' Shelter in San Francisco."

"Did you know who her parents were before you had decided to adopt her?"

"Yes, Doctor. A Captain and Mrs. Robert E. Elliott."

"Why did the Elliots abandon their baby?"

"The captain was killed by the Moros and his wife died in this city in childbirth."

"Do you remember what branch of the service the captain was in?"

"He was a captain of cavalry."

"When you and Mr. Gatlin adopted Penelope, did you have any written record of her parentage?"

"We had a letter from the matron at the Infants' Shelter. And we had a letter from the doctor who attended Mrs. Elliot at St. Dunstan's hospital, and some letters from old neighbors of the Elliots."

"Why did you get the letters from the old neighbors?"

"Theodore was concerned about the baby's ancestry."

"And was it the best?"

"I do not know. It satisfied Mr. Gatlin."

"What has become of all the records pertaining to Penelope?"

"I burned them."

"Why?"

"To keep Penelope from getting them."

"Then she wanted them, did she not?"

"Yes, Doctor. She demanded them."

"When was this?"

"On her eighteenth birthday."

"How did it happen that she waited until her eighteenth birthday before demanding them?"

"Up until then she thought she was our own flesh and blood."

"Ah! Why did you burn these records rather than give them to Penelope?"

"I hate her."

"When you refused to give them to her, what happened?"

"She cried and laughed and screamed and attacked me. She said she hated me. Finally she fainted, and I had the maid put her to bed and lock her in her room."

"Did you give Penelope any information at all, at any time, regarding her parentage?"

There was a slight hesitation. "I lied to her. I wanted to hurt her because she wouldn't recognize my moral right to half of Theodore's estate. So I told her she had negro blood in her veins."

"What made you invent such a horrible tale?"

"Penelope is a decided brunette. I thought even if she did not believe me, my statement would create in her mind a doubt and a fear that would drive her crazy."

"What happened after that, Mrs. Merton?"

"In the morning she was gone."

"How did she go?"

"She made a rope of sheets and blankets."

"Have you seen her since?"

"No."

"Is she dead?"

"I do not know. I hope so."

Stephen turned to Dan. "Any questions?"

McNamara shook his head owlishly. "I can revive most of the record—perhaps all of it. The captain's record is in the army files; when he married, a notice of it appeared in the Army and Navy Journal; with that and what I can get out of the officers who soldiered with the captain, I'll get a pretty complete picture."

Stephen resumed his cross examination.

"Did you ever beat Penelope? Did you ever pinch her and slap her and lock her up?"

"Yes, Doctor."

"Wake the fiend up and send her home," McNamara roared.

"I will—as soon as I look up her memory of Penelope," Stephen replied. He impressed upon her the fact that she was not ill at all. He commanded her very earnestly to forget that she had ever heard of him.

Then he awakened her, as McNamara departed, gave her a long look, felt her pulse, told her she was much improved and handed her some soda-mint tablets. She departed in a somewhat happier mood.

"Well," McNamara demanded, when he and Stephen found themselves alone again, "what do you think of that one for a hell-cat?"

"I do not think, Dan. We merely accept such people as we accept sunlight and rainfall."

"Do you think you'll see any more of this woman, Stephen?"

"I hope not. I hope the hypnotic suggestion I gave her is strong enough to overcome her acquired instinct for illness."

"Were the things she told you illuminating?"

"Very. I suspected most of them and she confirmed my suspicion. We know now that Penelope is of sound ancestry. Her father was not a neurotic. If he hadn't been a normal, gallant fellow and physically fit he would never have become a captain of cavalry. He was killed in action. But we have arrived at a starting point, Dan—the reason for the mental shock that gave Penelope a dissociated personality."

"I didn't get that—at least not quite, Stephen."

"For some reason best known to themselves, the Gatlins kept from Penelope the fact that she was not their own flesh and blood. However, while we have definitely established the date of the mental shock and the character of the shock, we have also established the causative factors leading up to the shock. Penelope had a most unhappy childhood. From earliest childhood she was the victim of bitter, rebellious thoughts. Then that baseball wrecked her nose. This was a mental and physical shock. The separation and divorce of the Gatlins was another terrible shock, because she lost Gatlin and there was nobody to protect her. And Gatlin's death was a severe shock. Then, as she emerged from childhood into maidenhood, the knowledge that her nose made her hideous naturally became an obsession with her.

"Now, Dan, by this time there was no further necessity for concealing the facts of the child's birth. Gatlin, dead, had left his entire estate in trust to Penelope, and on her eighteenth birthday she was free to do as she pleased. She could leave her hell-cat of an adopted mother now. She carried her own check book. The knowledge that she was not flesh and blood of the beloved Gatlin came as a terrible shock and with it, of course, came other terrifying speculations."

"More piling on of the inferiority complex," McNamara interrupted. "And she cracked under it. Then she made up her mind to forget Mrs. Gatlin—and she did."

"A clear case of auto-hypnosis Dan. Now you've got to run down the record of our Penelope and that of her parents. She must have it and it must be proof of the most convincing character, because such proof is necessary if we are to restore to her her mental tranquility."

"Well" said Dan, "I'll be back presently with the girl's record, and then—"

"Out of the darkness into the sunlight, Mac."

"Well, the next one I find in the darkness will stay there," the chief growled.

The absence of the capable Lanny was a constant reminder to Dr. Stephen Burt of his sole experiment to date in a case of dual personality. He yearned with an alert scientific yearning to get to work on Penelope Gatlin, and when Dan McNamara appeared at the office one day he saw by the satisfied smirk on the McNamara countenance that all had gone well.

"Let me see the documents," Stephen demanded.

McNamara handed over the pile of papers.

"Well, you've done your full duty and have kept the police of various cities busy for a few days," said Stephen. "What do you hear from Lanny?"

"She'll be home next week. The skin graft on the girl's nose was a complete success."

"And how does the girl feel about the situation now?"

"She's crazy about her new nose and spends hours examining it in a hand mirror."

Stephen smiled. "Naturally, she would."

"Lanny says the girl's been her real self more than half the time since that first look."

"She would be. And now I'm going to add to her happiness by sending her this record, which I shall supplement with a report of my own on her case. She'll study it, and in this convincing proof that she is not what Mrs. Merton told her she was, she'll probably get well. These cases are simple, Dan. All you have to do is to discover the cause and remove it. Nature does the rest. She will have no more rebellious thoughts, because the despot can do her no further harm. Her black moods of depression will not come again; she is organically and mentally sound, the product of a sound ancestry on both sides of her family."

"But she knows she was an inmate of San Quentin. She'll remember she was a thief."

"She will, of course, feel great shame when fully restored to her normal personality. In her other personality, with her acquired instincts of morality and convention smothered in her subconscious mind, she had, of course no sense of remorse or shame. I think that when I have explained this to her she will understand just what her mental condition was. And her fear that the world will discover her sorry record will, I feel certain, be alleviated by her knowledge that it would be impossible for anybody who knew her as saddle-nosed Nance Belden to recognize her as good-looking Penelope Gatlin."

"All I've got to say, young fella m'lad," the admiring McNamara declared, "is that you're one h—l of a smart man!"

Some two weeks later, Lanny walked in on Stephen. "Well," he declared acidly, "you've certainly taken your time about geting back on the job. You're looking mighty particular, Lanny. Happy?"

"Stevie, dear, I never knew there was such complete happiness in the world."

"Where's Penelope?"

"She's gone back to Paris—on a new passport."

"Well, well, well," Stephen chided her, "tell me things."

"Stevie, she's as lovely as a May morning."

"And the operation?"

"A phenomenal success. Of course," Lanny added, "she could never stand a sock on the nose."

"Just what is she going to do in Paris?"

"Close out her apartment and dismiss her servants."

"And coming back to San Francisco?"

Lanny nodded. "How do you stand Miss Ordway as your office nurse, Stephen?"

"Rather well, I'm sorry to say. She's very competent and much more tactful than you."

"And do you want me back, darling?" she queried.

"There you go, fishing for a compliment. Of course I do, but—it isn't necessary. You could come in once a week—"

"Not for a great many weeks, Stevie."

He glanced up at her sharply. "How come, Lanny?"

Lanny's face was the color of an old rose. "I'm going to have a baby," she whispered.

And then Stephen Burt stood up and took dear old Lanny in his strong young arms and hugged her. At last she was going to have her little slice of life!

"Of course," Lanny said presently, "you'll be the baby's god-father?"

He nodded. "Of course."

Three months passed—to Stephen Burt remarkable by reason of the fact that Mrs. Rudolph Merton did not call upon him. At last, to satisfy his curiosity, he telephoned Rudolph Merton to ask him how his wife was.

"I don't know," Merton replied complacently. "She's gone."

"Dead?"

"No such luck. She's gone to Southern California to join a new religious sect. A colony on the fringe of the San Bernardino desert with a prophet in command."

"And what are you doing about it, Mr. Merton?" Stephen asked.

"I'm subsidizing the prophet so he'll stay in business ten months longer. Mrs. Merton has deserted me, thank God, but she has to be away a year before I can secure a divorce on the grounds of desertion. The prophet comes high, but I can afford to pay for my fancies."

"Spends Hours Examining It in a Hand Mirror."

"I gather from your manner that you're not broken hearted."

"Such sorrow as I feel now would be delirious delight compared with what I'd feel if she decided to come back to me."

"I congratulate you, Mr. Merton. Good-by and good luck to you. You deserve it."

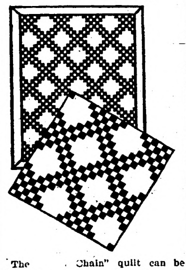
John Bunyan's Flute

While John Bunyan, who wrote Pilgrims Progress, was in prison his jailers heard music coming from his cell. They decided to take away his instrument, but the music ceased as they drew near the cell, and they could find nothing to show how the music was made. From time to time the music sounded, but only Bunyan and his book were found. What had happened was that Bunyan had made a flute from a loose rail of his stool, and on hearing the goaler's step he would slip it back into its place and pore over his book.

Strong Favorite of Quilt Makers

By GRANDMOTHER CLARK



The "[illegible] Chain" quilt can be found in almost every collection, and quilt makers will make at least one of these simple chain patterns. The single, double, or triple Irish Chain has one, two, or three blocks in the chain. The background is white and the squares are a solid blue, red, or other dark mixed colors to give contrast. The squares in this quilt measure 1¾ inches without seam, and they are appliqued on two different nine-inch blocks; one all checked, the other with a square in each corner. These are assembled alternately to give above effect.

Seven 9-inch blocks are used across top and nine blocks on side. With a 6-inch border quilt will measure finished about 72 by 90 inches. This quilt is simple to make but cutting of patches and blocks must be accurate to produce good results.

This quilt is one of the 33 popular quilts shown in book No. 23, which will be mailed to you upon receipt of 15 cents. Cutting charts, instructions and valuable information for quilt makers will be found in this book.

LOWER COST PER TON MILE
DUE TO FIRESTONE EXTRA CONSTRUCTION FEATURES

QUESTION No. 1—"Will the non-skid tread give me the greatest traction and protection against skidding?"

ANSWER—The patented construction feature of two extra layers of Gum-Dipped cords under the tread makes it possible for Firestone to use a wider, flatter tread with higher shoulders, that puts more rubber on the road. This, combined with the scientific non-skid design, gives greatest non-skid safety and traction ever known.

QUESTION No. 2—"Is the tire body protected against destructive internal heat, the chief cause of premature tire failure?"

ANSWER—Every cord in Firestone Tires is soaked and saturated in pure, liquid rubber by the patented Gum-Dipping process. This process, not used in any other tire, soaks every cotton cord and insulates every strand, preventing internal friction and heat, giving extra strength, longer life, greater dependability.

QUESTION No. 3—"Will the tread give me long wear at today's higher speeds?"

ANSWER—A new and tougher tread compound developed by Firestone gives you longer wear at lower cost per mile, even at today's higher speeds.

NYE'S COMMITTEE STRIKES AT SHIPYARDS—NEW DEAL BILLS GO FORWARD.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© Western Newspaper Union.

SENATOR NYE of North Dakota and his committee on munitions does not have a very high opinion of American shipbuilders and they feel that strong legislation is needed to keep them from confusing "public defense needs with their private pocketbooks." Therefore the committee, in a preliminary report, asks that laws be enacted to do these things:

Senator Nye

1. Prevent "collusion" in bidding for navy construction jobs.

2. Prevent American patents from getting into the hands of foreign powers.

3. Limit profits to 5 per cent of the total cost to the government, in cases where the government assumes the risks of the enterprise, or to 10 per cent where the government does not.

4. Require that shipbuilders' "lobbyists" register with the government and disclose their income and expenditures.

The committee finds, in the matter of collusion, that there was "telepathy" among shipyard officials so that in bidding for many contracts each concern was able to get the contracts it wanted at profits that ran as high as 36 per cent. It says the navy has been at the mercy of the shipyards in preparing plans for war vessels and also in determining what were fair prices.

"A series of bids are put before the navy," the report recites, "and the navy has to take the low one and the taxpayers have to hope and pray that the low one is somewhere within a few million dollars of being reasonable."

Construction of naval vessels is declared to be more costly in private yards than in government yards.

"While the evidence is not all in," the report says, "the indications are that the private yards cost the government from one to two million dollars more per cruiser than the navy yards."

The committee charges big shipbuilders with breaking up the Geneva naval limitation conference in 1927 and immediately launching a price-increase campaign that "made profits of 35 and 25.4 and 36.9 per cent on the cruisers."

EVEN Huey Long cheered when President Roosevelt's unexpected message on redistribution of wealth and increase of taxation for the rich was read to congress. The Chief Executive offered a program that he hopes will pay part of the vast expenses of the New Deal and at the same time break up some huge fortunes and check the growth of big corporations. He doesn't expect congress to do the entire job at this session, and the administration leaders at once set about stopping the radicals who wanted immediate enactment.

The President's taxation plan is frankly aimed against the wealthy, especially the men with million-dollar incomes. Of these there were 46 in 1933. In his message he said that existing tax policies have not prevented "unjust concentration of wealth and power," and added the warning: "Social unrest and a deepening sense of unfairness are dangers to our national life which we must minimize by rigorous methods."

The following legislation he recommended for enactment during the present session in order to obtain ample revenue without hampering enterprise and to distribute tax burdens equitably:

1. High inheritance and gift taxes on "all very large amounts received by any one legatee or beneficiary." Segregation of this revenue for reduction of the national debt.

2. Tax levies to restrict "very great individual net incomes."

3. Substitution of a graduated corporation tax ranging from 10¾ to 16¾ per cent for the existing 13¾ per cent rate.

For consideration at the next session of congress the President proposed:

1. Elimination "of unnecessary holding companies in all lines of business," by discriminatory taxation.

2. Discouragement of "unwieldy and unnecessary corporate surpluses."

3. An amendment of the Constitution to abolish tax exempt securities by authorizing the federal government to tax subsequently issued state and local obligations and state and local governments to tax federal securities.

Treasury officials estimated that about one billion dollars could be expected ultimately from the tax plan submitted.

WITH only six senators voting in the negative, the senate passed the tremendously important social security bill that already had gone through the house. During the five days of debate a number of members, Democrats and Republicans alike, had argued earnestly that this measure never would stand up in the Supreme court, but when their names were called nearly every one of them voted for it. The only consistent ones were Moore of New Jersey, Democrat, and Hastings of Delaware, Hale of Maine, Metcalf of Rhode Island, Austin of Vermont and Townsend of Delaware, Republicans. This social security measure will affect about 30,000,000 beneficiaries in the immediate future and by 1960, it is estimated, will cost the federal government more than $3,000,000,000 a year.

These are its main features:

1. An appropriation of $98,491,000 for the fiscal year 1936, including $49,750,000 for grants in aid to states for old age assistance. In addition there are authorized annual appropriations for the old age reserve fund, graduated from $255,000,000 in 1937 to $2,180,000,000 in 1980.

2. Income tax on employees and excise tax on employers, for old age benefits, beginning in each case at 1 per cent of the pay roll in 1937 and reaching the maximum of 3 per cent in 1949. In addition there is a pay roll tax on employers for unemployment insurance, beginning at 1 per cent in 1936, increasing to 2 per cent in 1937, and to 3 per cent, the maximum, in 1938.

3. Grants in aid to states on a matching basis for assistance to persons sixty-five or older, the government's contribution not to exceed $15 per month.

4. Old age benefits after January 1, 1942, ranging from $10 to $85 per month, depending upon the total amount of wages earned after December 1, 1936, and before reaching sixty-five years of age.

5. A 90 per cent credit to employers for taxes paid into state unemployment insurance funds, the other 10 per cent to be apportioned among the states for administration of their unemployment insurance laws.

SPURRED on by the White House, the house, after a hot debate, passed the Wagner-Connery labor disputes bill by acclamation, and President William Green of the American Federation of Labor hailed it as a "magna charta of labor." As is well known, the federation is the chief beneficiary of the measure, and Green and other labor union leaders had worked unceasingly for its passage.

Sen. Wagner

Opponents of this bill, including constitutional authorities in both parties, have asserted repeatedly that it is unconstitutional, and it is most probable that it will be carried to the Supreme court for an early test.

Every attempt to give the employer an even break with labor was voted down, but the house did accept an amendment making the new labor board an independent agency instead of a part of the Department of Labor as Secretary Perkins had demanded.

As passed by the house, the Wagner-Connery bill provides:

1. For the setting up of a permanent labor relations board of three members, appointed by the President, as an independent agency. The board, or its agencies or agents, is authorized to supervise elections, conduct hearings, and issue cease and desist orders for "unfair labor practices," which are enforceable by the courts.

2. That representatives selected by a majority of a unit of employees for the purpose of collective bargaining shall have the exclusive right to negotiate with the employer. The board may determine the appropriate unit for collective bargaining, whether by plant or craft, etc.

3. That it is an unfair labor practice for employers to restrain, coerce, or interfere with employees in their organization for collective bargaining.

4. That it is an unfair labor practice for employers to "dominate" or contribute financially to any labor organization.

5. That it is an unfair labor practice to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization for the purpose of making closed shop agreements.

6. A fine of $5,000 or a year in prison for anyone interfering with agents of the board, such as refusing to permit access to books and records.

"LABOR policy in a democracy is not a program conceived by a government. It is a program of action which the people who earn their living as wage earners and those who employ them in profit-making enterprises must work out together."

So asserts Secretary of Labor Frances Perkins in her annual report to congress, and she sets forth these six specific duties of the government in this respect:

1. To do everything in its power to establish minimum basic standards for labor, below which competition should not be permitted to force standards of health, wages and hours.

2. To further peaceful settlements of controversies and relieve labor of the necessity of resorting to strikes in order to secure equitable conditions and the right to be heard.

3. Through legislation and fostering co-operation between employers and workers to make every job the best that the human mind can devise as to physical conditions, human relations and wages.

4. To encourage such organization and development of wage earners as will give status and stability to labor as a recognized important group of citizens having a contribution to make to economic and political thought and to the cultural life of the community.

5. To arrange that labor play its part in the study and development of any future economic policies.

6. To encourage mutuality between labor and employers in the improvement of production and the development in both groups of a philosophy of self-government in the public interes

Encouragement to 'Carry On'

Glance Through Annals of American History Cannot Help but Reassure Those Troubled by the Passing Business Depression.

It is well for those who feel discouraged by the stress of living conditions as they find them nowadays to read American history and see what struggles their forbears had in settler times. There is an inclination to act as if this present period, critical as it may be, is unique; that those of us who are living today have the hardest conditions to face of any through which the inhabitants of the United States ever passed. If any persons have this depressing outlook, reading the annals of America can scarcely fail to be reassuring and encouraging.

In those early years of our history, dire want, privations, difficult even to comprehend in present times of simplified homemaking and mechanical contrivances, were linked with a lack of money so widespread that to help one's fellow creatures was scarcely possible unless one plunged one's self deeper into the miseries of destitution. Perhaps there is a temptation to minimize the distress of those days with the thought that such eras were but temporary because we know of the periods of prosperity which always followed.

It is true that prosperity returned. Should not this be the greatest encouragement at this time? Since such phases of depression formerly have existed, and since they always ended in brighter days, there is precedent in history to restore faith that such will surely be the case in the present instance.

It takes courage to face hard times and every one who has problems needs to keep this fine trait in action in order to carry on to the best of her ability. It is not believable, however, that the homemakers of today should fail to prove themselves as staunch helpmates and as courageous workers in present times of stress as were the women who in the old historic days bore their share of the brunt of perils. It is the final pull near the top of a hill which is said to be hardest. We are on the up-grade. Let home makers help persistently through careful methods, good cheer in the home and a reassuring faith in speedy return to prosperity based on historic precedent.

World's Many Languages

There are almost 3,000 individual languages in the world, according to the French Academy of Arts and Sciences, although the most of them are of local significance only. There are four, English, French, German and Spanish, which stand out as world languages. English, spoken or understood by at least 200,000,000 people, easily leads them all. French is the traditional tongue of diplomats, society and literature. It affects about 120,000,000 people. German is spoken or understood by about 110,000,000 persons and is the main speech of the Balkans and central Europe. A great deal of scientific and technical literature is in German. Spanish affects about 75,000,000, mostly in the Central and South American countries, where it is the chief commercial language except in Brazil where Portuguese is the national tongue. — Pathfinder Magazine.

TO FOIL BANK CROOKS

NEW YORK.—The American Bankers Association Protective Committee has developed a plan of bank inspection to bring out exposure hazards or weak spots in respect to attacks by criminals based on its long-established, nation-wide experience in investigating bank burglaries, holdups and sneak thefts.

The inspection covers eighty leading questions and seventeen recommendations which are instructive in the prevention of such crimes. These relate to such subjects as the use of alarms and other protective equipment, also the condition of windows, doors, skylights and other entrances which have facilitated the early morning entry of bandits who kidnap bank employees from their homes during the night, or break into the bank premises and bind and gag the employees.

BANKERS HELP

"Save the Land and You Save the Man" is the essence of a suggested agricultural program recommended by the Arkansas Bankers Agricultural Committee. "Beware of impoverished soil. It leads to impoverished homes," says a statement sent to the banks to be distributed to their farmer customers. "To help nature save the land, build up the soil, by:

a. Stopping soil erosion.
b. Planting legumes.
c. Raising livestock.
d. Developing pastures.

"Look ahead with confidence—know what you are doing, therefore:

1. Draw up a farm inventory.
2. Keep a record, daily or weekly.
3. Budget expense, and keep within it."

NEWS OF BERRIES

BERRY-TIME, a bright spot in the old dietetic year, when delicious little tarts and topping short-cakes make their appearance at feast-time, has become an all-year-round period, now that housewives have learned to put canned berries into these popular dishes.

Raspberries lead the list of canned berries in the quantity consumed, and because they come to you with that right-off-the-bush flavor and with their gay natural color, owing to the gold enamel lining of the cans in which they are packed, the following recipes will be welcome news:

For Breakfast and Dinner

Melons Waldorf: Cut small honeydew melons in halves and remove the seeds, allowing half a small melon for each serving. Scoop out small balls of banana and place three or four in each melon. Sprinkle with a few drops of lemon. Then fill the rest of the melon cavities with canned black raspberries and their syrup, and chill well. Serve for breakfast or for a first course at dinner. The size of the melons will vary, but a No. 2 can of berries should be enough for twelve servings.

Black Raspberry Triangles: Roll pastry thin and cut in 4-inch squares. Put a heaping tablespoon of canned black raspberries which have been slightly drained, on each square. Sprinkle with about one tablespoon of sugar and a few drops of lemon juice. Fold the pastry over diagonally, pressing the edges very well together so that not a drop of juice will leak out. Bake in a hot oven for twenty to twenty-five minutes, or until brown. A No. 2 can of black raspberries will make from fourteen to sixteen triangles.*

Do you believe in signs? Do you read the road signs? Do you pay attention to the markings as you travel on the highways?

I recommend that you do. The Highway Departments have spent thousands of dollars to make it easy and safe for motorists not only in the day time but for night travel as well. Many accidents can be avoided in this way. The sign "Curve" should be heeded especially. There is always an arrow indicating which way the curve is going to turn so that there should be no mistake about remaining on the road and on your side of the highway.

Heed road signs -- they are life savers.

Wm. Patznick Killed Monday

William Patznick, pioneer farmer northeast of here was killed on Monday evening when his car tipped over in the ditch as he was returning to his farm home from town. Mr. Patznick had been in Middle River attending to business and delivered his cream that afternoon and was on his way home when the accident happened about five miles southeast of there. He was driving a model A pickup Ford and as the tracks at the scene of the accident appeared he had been driving very slow at the time that it happened.

The car had made one complete turn upside down and pinned him under the side of it as he was partly thrown out. From the reports received here after the coroner had held an inquest, it was stated that he had died from heart failure before the car left the road. Mr. Lorentson, blacksmith at Middle River, was the first one on the scene of the accident after it happened and he stated that Mr. Patznick was dead when he found him.

Mr. Patznick has farmed for a number of years in the community about nine miles northeast of Holt. He leaves a large family to mourn his loss. Funeral services were conducted on Wednesday.

Clara Sandberg returned home Sunday from west of Newfolden where she has been employed.

1934 Creamery Honor Roll

We are this week publishing the list of producers that delivered about 1500 pounds or more of butterfat during the year of 1934. We find that the highest producer for 1934 delivered about 500 pounds of butterfat less than the high producer in 1933 when 3966 pounds was the high mark.

High honors for butterfat production in this community goes to C. F. Lindholm for 1934. This is the first time he has held the rank as highest producer according to the creamery records.

Competition is getting very keen now and it looks like Fred Steinhauer may capture first place for 1935.

Rye Loan Program Favored

Minnesota farmers, fearing the effects of the prospective bumper rye crop on the price of this commodity and other cash and feed grains, are vigorously demanding a loan and production adjustment program for rye, says Dr. Andrew Boss, state director of Agricultural Adjustment programs, at University Farm, St. Paul.

This office has been deluged with telegrams and written resolutions from grain farmers in all parts of the state asking for such a program, he announces. Furthermore, a group of 150 rye growers from Twenty Minnesota counties, meeting at St. Cloud, June 29, framed and submitted a resolution to the Agricultural Adjustment Administration at Washington, calling for a loan and production adjustment program for rye. A state representative from North Dakota was present at this meeting and reported a similar demand from the farmers of his state.

The St. Cloud conference, according to Mr. Boss, asked specifically for loans of not less than 50 cents a bushel on 1935 crop rye stored in suitable bins on farms in Minnesota and other important rye growing states; a maturity date for the loans "that will afford the fullest protection toward an orderly marketing of the surplus;" and the acceptance by the government of the rye collateral in lieu of cash payment, if the market price of the rye on maturity of the loans should be less than the loan value, plus accrued interest and insurance costs.

The conference also called for rye acreage control in 1936 by the use of contracts between individual growers and the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, and also the insertion of clauses limiting rye acreage in other commodity production adjustment contracts.

Minnesota's views on rye loans and production adjustment were presented to the Agricultural Adjustment Administration July 3 by J. W. Evans of Montevideo, a prominent member of the Minnesota Crop Improvement Association, at a conference in Washington attended by farmer representatives of 16 states. Mr. Evans also represented wheat growers of the state July 1 and 2 in Washington in a conference on the provisions of the new wheat adjustment contract, which will replace the one now in effect but expiring with the present crop year.

The Weather

The weather the past week has been more or less wet. On Saturday a part of the community had rain and on Sunday it rained all around here for a short time. Farmers are having a hard time getting their good hay crop cured.

Held School Election Tuesday

The annual school election was held here in the village on Tuesday evening and as usual only a few persons were interested enough in the matter to turn out.

The terms of Theo. Ness and Gilbert Sanoden expired at time. Mr. Sanoden was reelected to his job as secretary of the school board, a job he has held for many years past, and O. E. Sovde was elected as a member of the board to fill the place of Mr. Ness. According to the reports the school board here have done a good job of taking care of the financial end of the business in the past and have paid up several thousands of dollars of outstanding warrants and bonds. They have now refloated the bond issues of the district at much lower rate of interest than that paid before and have thru this process been able to save the taxpayers here a lot of money.

Miss Sylvia Alcott, Nutrionist for the SERA, was here on Wednerday and conducted a canning demonstration at the Nazareth Lutheran church. About fifty ladies attended the demonstratio and got many new pointers on how to preserve vegetables for winter use.

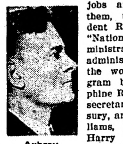
PRESIDENT PLANS TO AID YOUTH —TAX-RICH BILL HELD OVER.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© Western Newspaper Union.

YOUTH between sixteen and twenty-five will be served $50,000,000 for a nation-wide job hunt and further training of young men and women to hold jobs after they get them, through President Roosevelt's new "National Youth administration," itself administered under the works-relief program by Miss Josephine Roche, assistant secretary of the treasury, and Aubrey Williams, assistant to Harry L. Hopkins, works-progress administrator.



Aubrey Williams

The new organization will endeavor to:

1. Find employment in private industry for unemployed youth.
2. Train and retrain for industrial, technical and professional employment opportunities.
3. Provide for a continuing attendance at high school and college.
4. Provide works-relief projects designed to meet the needs of youth.

The average payment for youths on relief work will be $15 a month; those going to high school would be given $6 a month; college, $15 a month.

The problem of what to do with the youth who finishes school, supposedly equipped to make his real start in life, and finds what few jobs there are are given to older and married men and women, as well as the youth who is unable to finish school because of poor circumstances, has been one of the most discouraging aspects of the entire depression. The NYA will attempt to remedy it by divisions set up to work with private industry and schools in each state, co-ordinated by national headquarters in Washington.

LEGISLATIVE administration leaders, for a while in a frenzy of anxiety to hitch the President's tax-the-rich program to the resolution extending the so-called "nuisance" excise taxes, thereby speeding it through the Washington legislative factory in four days, suddenly disclaimed any intention of such procedure, and let the $500,000,000 tax extension ride along unappended. Congress will consider the new taxation program during early July.

This program is expected to produce some $340,000,000 in new revenue, principally from inheritance and gift taxes, increased taxes on the highest income brackets, and corporation taxes graduated from 10 per cent to 17½ per cent.

The program has been held up as a sweetmeat to placate the sugar palate of Louisiana's Kingfish. Actually, a wealth of $340,000,000 shared among 120,000,000 Americans would amount to about $2.83 a head—all of which would be applied to a public debt of $29,000,000,000 and a budget of $8,500,000,000, anyway.

The net taxable worth of the 133 estates which paid taxes based on a valuation of $1,000,000 each in 1933 was $284,000,000. If the government had taxed these estates 100 per cent, seizing them entirely, they would have been worth only $2.37 a head to the American population. If the government confiscated all income of more than $1,000,000 in 1933, it would have taken an army of trucks loaded with small change to distribute it, for each American would get only 45 cents. And the general opinion of administration leaders in the senate was that the taxes obtained from the rich might possibly eliminate the necessity of the "nuisance" taxes after another year.

THE federal government began a new fiscal year with intentions of spending more money than in any previous year of peace. Mr. Roosevelt announced that he would spend $8,520,000,000, of which $4,582,000,000 will go for "recovery and relief." He expects the treasury to collect $3,991,000,000. No, it doesn't add up. The deficit for the new fiscal year will be $4,528,000,000, it is estimated.

The fiscal year just passed came to an end with the public debt at a new peace-time peak of $28,665,000,000, still some shy of the $31,000,000,000 the President estimated a year ago. To finance the new budget, he had counted in part upon the $500,000,000 extension of "nuisance" taxes just passed by congress, but not upon the tax-the-rich program which the New Dealers hope to jockey through some time in August. Estimates have it that this will net another $340,000,000.

The expenditure for the past year is only $7,258,000,000 instead of $8,571,000,000 forecast at the start of the year. The deficit was $3,472,347,000 instead of the proposed $4,869,000,000.

If the expenditures outlined in the 1936 budget reach the estimated total, the public debt on July 1 next year would stand at $34,239,000,000.

During the next year the President expects to spend $4,880,000,000 for relief and for the employment of 3,500,000 idle workers. A general upswing in business would improve the revenue expected by the treasury. The President counted on $3,711,000,000 coming in during the 1935 fiscal year. Receipts proved to be $3,785,000,000.

AFTER one of the bitterest legislative fights of recent years the house voted 216 to 146 against the "death clause" of the utilities bill, a provision put upon the measure when the senate passed it by one vote, to abolish in seven years all public utility holding companies which the securities commission deemed "unnecessary."

The interstate commerce committee of the house voted to give the commission immediate discretionary authority. After the final passage of the utilities bill it will go to a conference committee to have the differences between the two houses ironed out.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT asked congress to prevent holders of federal gold bonds from suing the government for damages they may have suffered because the New Deal went back on the gold payment pledge.

The Chief Executive asked that an appropriation be made for Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau to pay off $8,000,000,000 in cash to bond holders who demanded immediate cash payment. Bond holders who plan to convert their bonds into cash and buy foreign gold will be given 100 paper dollars for a $100 gold bond. They contend that because it takes $1.69 to buy what was $1 worth of gold before the New Deal, they should be paid $169 in cash.

The President's stand was that the privilege of suing was an "act of grace" bestowed by the government. He asked that the privilege be withdrawn from the holders of gold bonds to prevent the use of the courts "in aid of efforts to sabotage the operations of the government or in aid of private speculation."

GEN. HUGH S. JOHNSON, once ambitious to direct the $3,000,000,000 public works program, was named to direct a comparatively small part of the President's now $4,000,000,000 works-relief schedule. As director of works-relief in New York city, he will co-ordinate the program in that area.

Gen. Johnson

With the famed fighting jaw determinedly set, he revealed the four conditions under which he accepted the new job:

He will get no pay, only $7,800 for a year's expenses. (He got $6,000 a year for this purpose during most of his time as keeper of the Blue Eagle.) His job will end October 1, unless he and the administration agree that it shall continue. He will devote a minimum of four days a week to his official duties. And he will consult with Mayor Fiorello H. La Guardia as far as possible, but will be responsible to Harry L. Hopkins.

NEW YORK'S Harlem and its kindred negro populations throughout the land resounded in jubilation, with chicken an' ham in every fryin' pan and juniper juice flowing freely, as Joe Louis, the first great brown hope of pugilism since Jack Johnson, established himself as a real threat to the world's heavyweight boxing championship.

The Detroiter cut Primo Carnera, Italian human skyscraper, to ribbons for five rounds, knocked him down three times in the sixth, and was declared the winner by technical knockout in a bout at the Yankee stadium.

LIKE most Utopias, the new one in Alaska's Matanuska valley has been reported a nest of discontent; the disillusionment apparently was manifest even quicker than usual in this case. Minnesota, Michigan and Wisconsin farm families who made up a large share of the recent expedition to begin life anew in the North Pacific territory drafted a list of grievances for the FERA trouble shooter, Eugene Carr.

Many of them said the project was misrepresented, that the land is poor and that housing is not what they were led to believe it would be. Neither are medical service, school facilities, seeds disbursed for planting, the climate and prices for groceries measuring up to advance word-pictures. There is considerable jealousy existent over the distribution of farm land. And to top it all off, the Utopians want government pay for their work.

THE week's peak in crime was reached when Detroit police found Howard Carter Dickinson, prominent New York attorney and nephew of Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes, lying dead in a ditch beside a lonely Rouge park road with a bullet through his head and another through his chest.

Dickinson, a law associate of Charles Evans Hughes, Jr., had been in Detroit on business of the $40,000,000 estate of the late William H. Yawkey. Apparently, he had driven to Rouge park while on a drinking party after business hours. His companions on the ride, who were William Schweitzer, Detroit underworld character, and three burlesque-show girls, all of whom he had picked up at his hotel in the motor city, fled the scene and were traced to Fort Wayne, Ind., where they were arrested.

After several days of grilling by police, the four confessed they had plotted the murder to rob Dickinson. Sweitzer admitted firing the shots. Their loot was $134.

DETERMINED that what goes up must stay up, Fred and Al Key, endurance fliers, broke the world's time record for keeping a plane aloft, landing after 653½ hours in the air at Meridan, Miss. They passed the unofficial endurance record of 647 hours, 28 minutes and 30 seconds set in 1930 by Dale Jackson and Forest O'Brien at St. Louis. Days before they had soared over the official mark of 553 hours, 51 minutes and 30 seconds set at Chicago by John and Kenneth Hunter.

Anoka—Joseph Ponczek, farmer, living near here, confessed to police that he murdered Mrs. Clara Williams of Minneapolis and buried the body in his yard. He had hired her as housekeeper.

Brainerd—The legendary figure of Paul Bunyan, superman of the north woods, will be brought to life in a gigantic pageant and exposition here July 18, 19 and 20. Preparations are under way to entertain 20,000 persons.

Waldorf—The school board has just completed arrangements to pay off the remainder of its state loan, $4,500, and $191.25 interest, erasing its debt. The loan papers will be burned at a celebration which will be arranged when they are received from the state.

Red Wing—Little Elisse, 10-day-old Indian papoose on the Prairie Island reservation near here, yawns at visitors and displays two tiny teeth she had at birth. Elisse, whose teeth were perfectly formed, is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Martin White of the reservation.

St. Paul—Governor Floyd B. Olson issued an order directing the game and fish department to bar commercial fishing of bullheads throughout the state. Catching of bullheads by angling is permitted with a limit of 30 a day and the same limit in possession at any time.

Duluth—Dismissal of 31 state employes here who are not members of the Farmer-Labor party was announced by the state railroad and warehouse commission. The men were inspectors, weighers and samplers, who have been on half-time for several months due to lack of coal and grain movements.

Faribault—Two Faribault men are under arrest on charges of larceny growing out of their alleged acceptance of relief while having sizeable postal savings accounts. They are Henry Swanson who is reported to have had $1,200 in savings and Emil Paquette who, with his wife, was said to have had nearly $600.

Northfield—In memory of Robert Selden Strong, who met death last October in an airplane accident in California, a student loan fund of $10,000 will be established at Carleton college by his mother, Mrs. Edward A. Strong of San Marino, Calif., formerly of Minneapolis. Mrs. Strong already has established the fund in a gift

St. Paul—Two northwest conservation groups, the Midwest Conservation Alliance and the Association of Midwest Fish and Game Commissioners, representing thousands of sportsmen and game commissioners, demanded an immediate one-year moratorium on hunting of waterfowl to prevent what they called a crisis threatening several species of birds.

Fairmont—Martin county farm organizations appealed to Secretary Henry Wallace for the AAA to arrange loans on sealed grain similar to last year's corn loans. A resolution making the request was adopted and sent to Secretary Wallace by the Martin County Farm Bureau, corn-hog allotment committee, wheat allotment committee and the county warehousing board.

Minneapolis—The board of park commissioners approved a budget request of $511,600 for operation of parks, playgrounds, street forestry and the municipal airport during 1936. This is an increase of $93,060 over the $418,600 budget allowance for 1935 and would call for a tax rate of 2 mills as compared to 1.7 mills this year. The request will go to the board of estimate and taxation for action late in the fall.

Minneapolis — Reinforcements of about 8,000 men are being recruited in Minnesota to the ranks of the CCC workers—mainly to work improvements in the state's vast forest empire. Restocking of about 7,000,000 acres of forest in Minnesota is one of the chores on which the men will engage. Added to the approximately 12,000 CCC workers in the state, the new recruits will raise the total to about 20,000. Some will engage in soil conservation and park work but nearly three-quarters of them will work in the woods.

LIVE IN TOWNS WITH NO TAXES

People of French Communes Should Be Happy.

Just the spot we have been seeking all our lives. Towns where no taxes are paid and where on the contrary one is paid to live there.

It may sound like a fairy tale. Yet it is a fact, confirmed by official documents, that 24 French communes in the Jura mountains, on the Swiss border, with a population of about 10,000, pay no local taxes. Instead each inhabitant receives a yearly dividend, ranging from 100 to 200 francs.

The explanation is quite simple. In years gone by these communes became the proprietors of spruce and fir woods in the vicinity. These woods are exploited in businesslike fashion by each commune so well that there is a profit after all the communal expenses have been paid. This profit is divided among the inhabitants.

La Chaux des Crotenay, one of these communies, which is an attractive mountain resort, may be taken as one of the best examples. During the present century nobody has paid any local taxes. Instead, each inhabitant, including women and children, has received a yearly check averaging 150 francs.

Further, each family has been furnished with free firewood and, since the allowance has been quite generous, half of it has generally been sold, adding to the dividend check.

Whenever a citizen of the commune desires to build a house, he is given a free plot of ground. Also free stone and sand. Finally, the village doctor is subsidized by the commune and, according to the contract, he has reduced his fees.

Many square miles of Jura forest land are owned and exploited by the communes and the villages have literally gone into the wood-cutting and wood-selling business. The profits are devoted to municipal expenses.

The dividend-paying villages are naturally proud of this unusual distinction, and, as naturally, newcomers who may seek to become permanent inhabitants to get their share of the booty are not welcomed cordially.

YOU ALWAYS GET BETTER QUALITY
AT NO HIGHER PRICE WHEN YOU BUY A FIRESTONE TIRE WITH FIRESTONE NAME AND GUARANTEE

TIRES may look alike on the outside, but on the inside where blowouts start, they are different. Firestone Tires are made blowout-proof by Gum-Dipping, a patented extra process which soaks every cotton cord and insulates every strand with pure liquid rubber. In fact, every 100 pounds of cotton cords absorb eight additional pounds of liquid rubber. This special process prevents internal friction and heat, the main cause of blowouts. No other make of tire is Gum-Dipped, yet you pay no more for Firestone blowout-proof protection than you are asked to pay for tires built without this patented safety construction feature.

The make of tires you buy for your car becomes a matter of vital importance when you realize that there were 882,000 automobile accidents in 1934 injuring 954,000 people and killing 36,000 and that 43,000 of these accidents were caused by blowouts, punctures and skidding.

Firestone High Speed Gum-Dipped Tires hold all world records on road and track for safety, speed, mileage and endurance. These records emphasize the undisputed evidence that Firestone Tires are not only blowout-proof but give greatest protection against skidding.

1 University tests show Firestone High Speed Tires stop cars 15 to 25% quicker.
2 Gum-Dipped cords give greater blowout protection. Gum-Dipping is not used in other tires.
3 Wider, flatter tread gives more than 50% longer non-skid wear.

THERE ARE THREE QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS THAT WILL SOLVE YOUR PROBLEM OF WHAT TIRES TO BUY

1 "Will the tread give me the greatest traction and protection against skidding?"
Recent tests by a leading University show that Firestone High Speed Non-Skid Tires stop a car 15% quicker than any other of the leading makes.
For eight consecutive years Firestone Tires have been on the winning car in the dangerous Pike's Peak Race where a skid means death. This is undisputed evidence that Firestone gives car owners greatest protection against skidding.

2 "Are they blowout-proof?"
Firestone Gum-Dipped Tires have the most amazing records for being blowout-proof of any tires ever built. In the gruelling 500-Mile Race at Indianapolis, May 30th, every one of the 33 cars was equipped with Firestone Gum-Dipped Tires. Kelly Petillo won the race and broke the record over this 26-year-old rough brick track without tire trouble—in fact, not one of the 33 drivers had tire trouble of any kind.
Ab Jenkins drove his 5,000 pound car on Firestone Gum-Dipped Tires over the hot salt beds of Utah, 3,000 miles in 23½ hours, at an average speed of 127.2 miles per hour, with temperatures as high as 120°, without tire trouble of any kind. These are most amazing proofs of blowout protection ever known.

3 "Without sacrificing these two important safety features will they give me longer mileage, thus making them the most economical tires I can buy?"
Firestone High Speed Tires not only give you more than 50% longer wear, but also lowest cost per mile. This is made possible by the tough, wear-resisting tread built with higher shoulders and a wider, flatter contour. This thick, rugged, scientifically designed tread is held securely to the Gum-Dipped cord body by Firestone's patented construction of two extra layers of cords under the tread. This is a special construction feature not used in any other tire. Unequaled mileage records by thousands of car owners add undisputed evidence of the longer wear and greater economy of Firestone High Speed Tires.

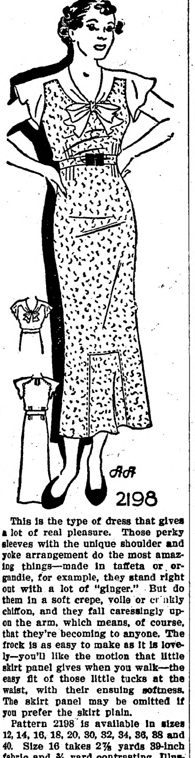
NEW IDEAS LEND CHARM TO FROCK

PATTERN 2198



This is the type of dress that gives a lot of real pleasure. Those perky sleeves with the unique shoulder and yoke arrangement do the most amazing things—made in taffeta or organdie, for example, they stand right out with a lot of "ginger." But do them in a soft crepe, voile or crinkly chiffon, and they fall caressingly upon the arm, which means, of course, that they're becoming to anyone. The frock is as easy to make as it is lovely—you'll like the motion that little skirt panel gives when you walk—the easy fit of those little tucks at the waist, with their ensuing softness. The skirt panel may be omitted if you prefer the skirt plain.

Pattern 2198 is available in sizes 12, 14, 16, 18, 20, 30, 32, 34, 36, 38 and 40. Size 16 takes 2⅞ yards 39-inch fabric and ¾ yard contrasting. Illustrated step-by-step sewing instructions included.

SEND FIFTEEN CENTS (15c) in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for this pattern. Write plainly name, address, and style number. BE SURE TO STATE SIZE.

Address orders to Sewing Circle Pattern Department, 243 West Seventeenth street, New York City.

As Stephen hung up the telephone receiver, chuckling, Miss Ordway brought in his mail. In it he found a registered parcel that had been through the custom house, with duty prepaid on it. It contained the finest and most expensive combination stop-watch and timepiece he had ever seen, and a note that read:

"Dear Doctor Burt:

"I know it would not be au fait for me to ask you for a bill for professional services, for I realize that what you did for me was done as one human being to another and quite without thought of financial remuneration. Moreover, I prefer to remain forever your debtor. You will never know what you have done for me. Christ, restoring life to the dead son of the widow of Nain, performed no greater miracle than did you in restoring life and happiness to my dead soul. I would try to thank you if words were not so pitifully inadequate to express the profundity of my gratitude. Will you not please accept the enclosed trifle as a token of that gratitude, and add one more debt to those already owed you by me?

"It is not easy to learn to live with my secret, now that I have found it out. I am trying to regard the past as one harks back in memory to a very serious illness. Some days, when I have achieved sufficient courage I am curious about my other self, evolved from darkness. There are blanks in my life. Perhaps you can fill them in. Perhaps you will not care to, knowing that they are better left blank. I do not think, however, that I was ever terribly wicked. If so, I have no recollection of it.

"Your grateful
"Penelope."

"Old Mother Nature is speaking to Penelope," he soliloquized, and replaced his father's old watch with the one Penelope had sent him. "Give Nature a chance—give her an even break—and she'll prove herself the greatest physician of all."

After some consideration he wrote the following to Penelope:

"Come home and let me iron out the few remaining wrinkles so your life will be as smooth as you could wish. The watch is wonderful. Thanks and I think you are very wonderful, too. Love as usual.

"Stephen."

It occurred to him to tuck that last phrase in for good measure. Love—not merely the love of a man for a woman but the love that is a fine friendship—was, he knew, very necessary to Penelope. She must, he knew, be assured that in all the world somebody really cared. Nobody knew better than he the wreckage that kindness and love denied can make of human lives; never a day passed without leaving him evidence of this.

He was not getting quite his little slice of life. Money, success, the joy of accomplishment, professional standing, the respect of his colleagues, he had, plus some good friends and true. But he was lonely.

He decided not to dine alone. It would be far better to drop in unannounced on Lanny and Dan, take pot luck for dinner.

CHAPTER XII

It was late fall. Stephen had just returned from his vacation; it was his first day back at the office and he was a bit rebellious at the flood of patients that awaited him. He finally got rid of the last one at five-thirty, and following his custom, settled back for a pipeful of tobacco, when Miss Ordway entered.

"There's a young lady calling," she announced. "She says she is Miss Elliott."

"I don't know her, Miss Ordway. A prospective patient?"

"I imagine she is. I didn't ask."

"Tell her it's beyond office hours and suggest that she call during office hours tomorrow."

Miss Ordway departed to deliver the message, but returned presently to say that the young lady begged to be permitted to see him. "Very well, show her in," he acquiesced irritably, "but remember Professor Finnegan if she stays too long."

Miss Elliott entered. Stephen rose and waved her to a chair. Then: "Well, Miss Elliot, what seems to be the trouble?"

"Does my general appearance indicate to you, even remotely, that I am one who requires the services of a neurologist and psychiatrist?" she asked him.

Stephen smiled. "Scarcely. What is it, then? You want a subscription to something?"

"How astute you are, Doctor. I am soliciting subscriptions to a fund designed to furnish expert medical attention to a very deserving public servant. I refer to Detective Sergeant Patrick Joseph Flynn."

"I know him, Miss Elliott. What's wrong with Flynn?"

"His blood pressure seems to be very high—"

"Nothing doing, Miss Elliott," Stephen interrupted. "I admit I sold this terrible Flynn the notion that he had high blood pressure, but I did that for a reason I do not care to explain. The man has the arteries of a boy. What's Flynn to you? And just who might you be?"

"You have my name. What I want to know is this: Are you ashamed to take me out to dinner?"

"No, of course not." Stephen blinked.

"I appear eminently respectable?"

"Quite. In fact, a most presentable lady."

"Not so homely, eh?"

"On the contrary. But I shall not go to dinner with you."

"Why?"

"Well, while the experience might be delightful, I think you're too pert."

The lovely face drooped sorrowfully. "Oh, Stephen, would you be that mean to poor little Penelope?"

"Good god of love!" Stephen almost yelled. "Are you my little Penelope?"

"Of course I am. Oh, Stephen, you great booby, not to recognize me!"

He came from behind his desk, took her fiercely by the shoulders and gazed down at her, too amazed to speak. "That's a pretty good second-hand nose, isn't it?" Penelope queried, with just the suspicion of a quaver in her tone. "Don't tell me you disapprove. I adore it myself."

Very soberly he quoted:

"And you, my sweet Penelope, out there somewhere you wait for me,
With buds of roses in your hair, and kisses on your mouth."

"Oh, Stevie!" she whispered. "Take one."

He took three, and Penelope rested contentedly in his arms.

He hugged her fraternally. "My dear, dear girl," he declared, "if I were a praying man I'd get right down on my knees and send up a prayer of gratitude to Omnipotence. You're well?"

"Oh, yes, indeed I am," the girl cried with a catch in her voice, "I'm happy —not perfectly happy but—hug me! Oh, Stephen, Stephen, it was so hard not to come back when I received your cablegram. But I had to fight things out and I didn't want to come home until I could meet you bravely. Stephen, are you truly glad to see me again?"

"I am," he answered, and marveled that he should be so glad as he was.

"With Buds of Roses in Your Hair, and Kisses on Your Mouth."

His heart, for some mad reason, was singing within him.

"Sit down," he commanded, and went back to his own chair. "I'm going to talk to you for five minutes, and then the subject will be taboo for ever. Imagine a long hill with a deep pond at the foot of it—a pond all scummy green and slimy—a miasmatic pond. Imagine that you started running down that hill in the dark, that you stubbed your toe and rolled the remainder of the way—into that pond. Well, that's exactly what happened to you. You were running in the dark and you stubbed your toe and landed in a social stratum equivalent to that scummy pond. Do you remember your foster-mother?"

"Faintly—as one remembers faces and events of one's childhood."

"Well, don't bother to remember her. Her cruelty almost ruined your life, but she is out of your life now, never to return. There are four human beings living who know that Penelope Gatlin and Nance Belden were one and the same. I wrote you a meticulous account of your illness, so you understand all about that, but what I want you to know now is that no power on earth can ever discover you for the purpose of making you pay the penalty for the misdeeds of Nance Belden. By the way, where did you get that name?"

"I had forgotten who I was and I had to have a name. So I picked that one out of a book."

"The new nose has helped wonderfully, hasn't it?"

She nodded. "I do not want to hide from people now, Stephen."

"You must not. That would be depriving the people of the sight of something very sweet and wonderful."

The eager wistfulness in her fine eyes thrilled him. "Do you think I'm sweet and wonderful, Stephen? I want you to, most of all."

"My dear, come here," he commanded, "and sit on my knees just as you used to do when you were Nance Belden and a simple child of impulse—when you hadn't the least compunction about making love to me."

Penelope flushed, but nevertheless obeyed. Stephen drew her cheek down to his. "I want to tell you something," he murmured. "The first night I saw you, my heart went out to you. And when Dan told me how it all happened, I had a tremendous admiration for your courage and wit. I love brainy people, Penelope, and you have brains. I knew what was wrong with you and I felt so sorry for you, my poor dear; I wanted to help you more than I ever wanted to help any human being. I understood all about you; you were just a little lost atom crying so pitifully to be saved, to know love and protection and happiness, that you developed into a game, and Lanny and Dan and I just had to play it to the finish."

"Have you thought of me sometimes?"

"Oftener than I cared to admit to myself. Penelope, I know all about you. In this box on my desk are all the records. Look at them, Penelope dear."

"Then you bothered to find out everything—you cared for me just a little bit?"

"A considerable bit—just how much I didn't realize until now. I want you for my patient always, or as long as we both live."

"What do you mean, Stephen?"

"I'm clumsy, I dare say, but I have more than a suspicion that I've been in love with you—and now that I have you back I'm quite certain I love you enough to want you to marry me. I think my love for you will grow with the years that we are going to spend together."

"And you'll never think back—never be ashamed of me—never regret your course? And are you sure this isn't just pity?"

"Pity is akin to love. It started in pity, sweetheart—and it's growing every minute. Fast work, my Penelope, but I'm not afraid to trust my instinct. You're my woman. You love me a little, do you not?"

"Why," said Penelope soberly, "I've loved you from the day Dan brought me to this office. You were kind to me, and you didn't seem to see my nose. I was so grateful—and ever since I've been waiting out there, somewhere." She hugged him fiercely. "Oh, Stevie, darling, all the rest of my life I shall devote to you. I'll not be oppressive with my love and I'll not be possessive, but I do want the task of adding to your happiness. I know what happiness is. I can appreciate even a little bit—and I'll never forget to cherish what you gave me and give back all I can."

"That way happiness lies. You seem to have the formula," he replied gravely.

The door from Miss Ordway's office opened and the nurse looked in.

"I'm sorry, Doctor Burt, but Professor Finnegan has just telephoned that you are fifteen minutes late to your engagement to meet the great German savant, Herr Doktor Uffitz."

"But I didn't press the button, Miss Ordway."

"I know you didn't, Stevie, dear," Penelope spoke up, "but I did—accidentally."

Miss Ordway blushingly withdrew.

"Who is Professor Finnegan, darling?" Penelope wanted to know.

"Just a fictitious person Lanny and I invented to help rid me of nuts that stay too long, sweetheart. You don't have to consider him at all."

"I wouldn't, of course," said Penelope. "I'm queen here, am I not?"

[THE END.]

Noah Webster's "Best Seller"

In 1783, Noah Webster published "A Grammatical Institute of the English Language." It was written in three parts: A spelling book, a grammar and a reader, observes a writer in Cosmopolitan Magazine. Webster's royalty, though less than one cent a volume, still must have been pretty handsome, for the book was the first of the American best sellers. Before the beginning of the Civil war it was selling at the rate of more than a million copies a year. Webster began work on his famous dictionary in 1807; it was published in 1828, and contained 12,000 words, and about 30,000 definitions that had not appeared in any other dictionary.

Snake Spits Poison

The snake which spits poison is the Egyptian spitting cobra. The mechanism of this spitting appears to be that by compression of the poison glands the venom is forced out through the fangs, and at the same time a blast of air is exhaled. This carries the liquid forward as a spray for a considerable distance, and if it strikes a person in the eyes, intense irritation is set up which results in temporary and sometimes permanent blindness.

For That Mid-Meal "Snack"

Light Refreshments, Often Desirable, Especially for Children, Should Be of Simple Nature and Require Little Preparation.

Eating between meals may be a good thing, and it may not be. It depends upon the individual and the circumstances. There are countries and circumstances in which meals are so spaced that to eat between meals would be both foolish and unnecessary. For example, when, before rising, a cup of tea is brought and this is followed at a later hour by breakfast, then lunch, afternoon tea, a full course dinner, and a late supper (in America we give this last meal the name of theater supper), where in such a schedule is there need or desire for a mid-meal? The above schedule is not unusual.

Then there are other countries where a bit of food between meals is craved. In American homes we often find a mid-meal needed when there is a long stretch between an early breakfast and a luncheon, sometimes set late to accommodate students. If luncheon is early there is apt to be recourse to the pantry between four and five o'clock for a mid-meal, unless afternoon tea is served. Those in the business world not infrequently take time for a snack either in the mid-morning or mid-afternoon, according to whether their luncheon time is early or late. And if no time can be taken to go out for it, or to eat it should it be brought in, it is usually possible to be excused for a moment, when a cracker, a cooky, a bit of fruit or a glass of milk (from a vacuum bottle), can be quickly taken and prove reviving.

On shipboard mid-meals are served as regularly as other meals, increasing the number from three to five and six meals. About eleven a morning broth with or without crackers is brought around. An afternoon tea is served as part of the regular service, on certain lines, while a supper is obtainable during the evening. So do the steamship companies provide plenty of nourishment to gratify hungry appetites in the bracing sea air.

Those who are dieting may find it advisable to eat less at the regular meal and have the allotment divided, so that the craving for food between meals can be satisfied. Children are apt to require mid-meals. They are active little people, use up their vitality quickly, and need to have it restored by between-meals food. The important matter in all mid-meal eating is to have it come, as the name implies, mid-way between two consecutive meals, with the balance preferably a trifle away from the first and toward the second meal.

Marry at 12 and 13

Girls mature in the Far North as early as they do in the tropics, many of them marrying at twelve and thirteen. Their average span of life is about thirty-five.

If you are looking for good farms come to this community. Call at the News Office and we will let you know who the parties are that want to sell land, stock, machinery and all. Some will sell now with a good crop on the farm.

The heavyweight boxer weighs over 175 pounds; the light heavyweight, 175; middleweight, 160; welterweight, 147; lightweight, 135; featherweight, 126; bantamweight, 118; flyweight, 112.

BETTER BREAKFASTS

May Bring You Prosperity

BUILDING on the basis of the old adage, "we eat to live," some food experts maintain that we would live better if we ate better food. Breakfasts, especially, determine our peak efficiency for the day. In this era of change, where vital problems are to be solved, it is particularly important for people to start the day with adequate breakfasts.

Gay Tables Pep Up Appetites

Try stimulating appetites by serving a very cheery-looking breakfast. Attractive breakfast cloths may be made at home, in your spare time, out of green, yellow or perhaps rose linen, with featherstitched hems and tassels on the four corners. Alternate your cloths, choosing some attractive glassware which affords a gay and pleasing contrast.

Plan a fruit cocktail that not only does something for your appetite because of its taste, but which also enhances the appearance of your table. Golden wedges of pineapple piled in high green glasses with red-ripe strawberries is something to look at and something to eat!

Are You Inventive?

If you are inventive, you will not serve toast and butter for every breakfast of the week. Consider the variety of hot biscuits which can be quickly made with modern biscuit mixtures — fruit biscuits, cheese biscuits, whole wheat biscuits with dates—there are endless opportunities! There are also English crumpets on the market which need only toasting and buttering in the kitchen while they are piping hot, and various breadsticks which are delicious when spread with butter, sugar and cinnamon and toasted for a moment.

Because dietitians have worked out breakfast menus which include properly balanced foods, it is important that housewives adapt these menus to their family's needs. The following suggestion is offered as a fitting way to start the day feeling fit.

Fresh Strawberry and Pineapple Cocktail
Chipped Beef Shortcake
Hot Biscuits Grape Jelly
Coffee

Chipped Beef Shortcake: Pull into pieces the chipped beef from a 2½-ounce jar and frizzle in two tablespoons butter for a few minutes. Mix two tablespoons of flour to a cream with one cup of water and three-fourths cup of evaporated milk. Add to the chipped beef and cook until creamy, stirring constantly. Add two tablespoons of chopped blanched almonds and season to taste with a few grains of pepper. Serve between split and buttered hot biscuits. This serves four persons.

Fresh Coffee the Crux

Of course all the other things count, but the crux of a good breakfast is strictly fresh coffee. This beverage gives breakfast a large part of its lure and also much of its tempting aroma. And that's the point. If the coffee is not fresh, both its taste and aroma will be conspicuous by their absence.

Fortunately there is one way to be 100% sure that the coffee you serve will be fresh. That is to buy the brand you like best that comes in a vacuum packed can. Coffee so packed keeps fresh until it is opened, and so has a big head start on coffee packaged in any other way. The vacuum protects both taste and the aroma, and makes you appreciate the above prosperity breakfast.*

Safetygrams

BY FRED W. BRAUN The Safety Man

I have repeatedly warned motorists about the careless practice of backing up without looking.

Hind sight is as important as foresight. The rear mirror should be so adjusted that you will always have a clear view of the road behind you. This is not only advisable for truck drivers but also for the passenger automobile.

Many drivers park their car near the curb and leave it for a few minutes. In returning they find that someone has driven ahead of them and in order to get into the road they make a sudden backward movement only to find that there has been an accident.

Keep your rear view mirror clean and so adjusted that it will give you a clear vision of the road behind you.

County May Share Road Fund

Marshall County was invited this week by N. W. Elsberg, state highway commissioner, to participate in a $1,300,000 allotment of emergency federal works funds set up for use on rural or "farm to market" roads.

Letters outlining the program have been sent by Commissioner Elsberg to County Auditor Levi G. Johnson, says a Highway department bulletin.

The $1,300,000 is 25 per cent of Minnesota's $5,200,000 allotment of national work relief highway funds. Federal regulations require that one-fourth of the the total be spen on roads off of the state trunk system and outside of municipalities and metropolitan areas. The funds will be administered by the state highway department, which will supervise the work through the agency of the local county highway engineers.

"There aro several important points for counties to consider in planning to participate in the use of these funds", said Commissioner Elsberg. "Federal regulations require that 90 per cent of all labor used on a job financed entirely by federal funds be taken from the relief rolls. Therefore plenty of relief labor must be available. The rate of pay will have to be the same as that of the state highway department, which is 55 cents an hour for unskilled labor 70 cents an hour for intermidiate grades and $1 an hour for skilled labor.

"Total cost of a project must not exceed 90 cent per man hour of employment, including all materials, equipment costs, etc. If the costs of a jub runs higher than this the local community must pay the difference. It has also been our experience that any work of this kind involves various items of cost which the federal government will not pay. The local community must therefore guarantee to pay any such items which may arise.

"If a county has available sufficient funds of its own it may combine them with the federal money and thus purchase materials and pay for equipment not available when federal funds are used alone.

"I realize that under these federal regulations it is going to be difficult for many counties to participate in the program. The relief labor requirements and wage scales present serious problems in many rural communities. However, the regulations are prescribed by Washington officials and the Highway department cannot alter them.

"In making use of its own allotment of relief funds, the Highway department is asking the State Executive Council to provide additional state funds to use with the federal money. Only in this way do we believe that permanent, worth while construction can be accomplished on a sizeable scale with the federal funds. However, work on the rural roads does not have to be of as high standard as on the trunk highway system."

BANK DEPOSITS WERE SAFEST INVESTMENTS

High Government Official Says No Investments Except U. S. Bonds Suffered as Little Loss as Deposits in Closed Banks

WASHINGTON, D. C.—No form of investments except Government bonds suffered as little loss as deposits in closed banks during the years 1931-32-33, Jesse H. Jones, Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, declared in a recent address.

"A point generally overlooked in connection with bank failures in this period, is that upon the whole, depositors in closed banks will get a somewhat larger percentage than has been true in bank failures over a period of say twenty-five years," Mr. Jones said. "Heretofore they have gotten about 58%, but in these wholesale bank closings, my estimate is that they will, upon the average, get about 65% of their deposits.

"Another point worthy of mention is that a depositor in a closed bank loses only a part of his deposit, while the bank stockholder loses all, plus a stock assessment.

"No form of investment, except Government bonds, has suffered as little loss as deposits in closed banks, and while I appreciate that there is little consolation in this fact, those who had their savings invested in stocks, bonds, mortgages, real estate, industrial investments, or in businesses of any kind, have had losses very much greater, and in a much larger percentage, than have depositors in closed banks.

"It is for these reasons, and others not necessary here to enumerate, that it is not possible to justify paying depositors in closed banks with the taxpayers' money."

Hitting Haying On High

The farmers have now throwed the mower, rake, horses, hired help and themselves into high gear and are putting up hay like nobody's business. The hay crop is very heavy this year and the weather the past week has been ideal for that kind of farm work.

Several carloads of people from other parts of the county were here on Sunday to pick June berries. The mosquitos gave them hard rub and the heat was also bad on Sunday.

Joseph Nelson has this week repaired the damage done to the Nazareth Lutheran church when lightning hit it during the heavy electric storm we had here recently. Most of the belfry was torn up and some shingles were torn of the roof.

Arno Stienhauer has purchased a new Pontiac sedan recently.

Hans Langlie has purchased a new V8 Ford coach from Sam Lorentson.

V. E. Oakey has bought a new Pontiac coach.

Joe Jarland purchased a new Plymouth coach on Monday.

Elmer Odie, Mud Lake farmer made a deal on Friday for a new Chevrolet sedan. Jesse Sorum sold him the job.

CHAPTER I

—1—

Monday

"Listen," his father said to Hal Ireland downtown—in the large office off the bank that was all soft carpets, soft lights, soft paneling, and enough floor-space rental to keep five families in comfort for a year; "listen."

"I've been listening, sir," said Hal, "for twenty minutes."

The Old Man seemed to wait a little for the slow draining of humor from Hal's alert, gray eyes. Then he said in quiet irony:

"I dare say you've been told about your charm—"

"Never by you, sir," said Hal with a faint bow, checked gently for fear of starting the slow, heavy throb in his head again.

"I dare say you've been told that when you bow that way, and let your eyes twinkle, you're apt to get your way. But I venture to point out what I can't convince myself you've learned for yourself: that the business world is not made up of pretty girls or susceptible matrons—social or theatrical; that the business of the country, about which you know nothing, is carried on by men who think more of persistence and application than they do of capacity to hold whiskey, or acquaintance with speakeasy proprietors or handicaps at golf or the fit of white flannels.

"The San Francisco job is open till the first of the month—because they need somebody, not because I've asked them to let you coast in on my name. You've got your last penny from me—for transportation or anything else—till next quarter's allowance. If you want the job, get yourself out there. If you don't, don't."

Hal's quick, mobile face was set, and he met his father's steady look with bright, impersonal steadiness, rather as if he had a peevish, disappointing child before him. Then he got up and straightened his good shoulders with a deep breath.

"That all?" he said.

"That's all," said the Old Man, briskly casual.

"Right," said Hal, with a practiced clipping of the word. "Well—'bye."

He swung his back on his father and walked over the thick carpet to the door. In the silence, he could feel his father expecting him to turn there for another word—of hope, or of opening. So he pulled the door, caught the other knob behind him, and stepped out, leaving only the soft, efficient click of the latch for comment.

Dalrymple — known downtown as Frederick Ireland's knife and fork—was waiting unoptimistically outside, where he couldn't be seen from the banking floor. "Bad?" he asked apprehensively.

"Bad," said Hal, letting his gray eyes light again with their welcoming humor. "Rage-making. D'you know anything about bromo-seltzer? Does it really work?"

"They say so, but I've never needed—"

"And I'm never going to again—never, never—probably. How do you get to California on six dollars?"

"Lord, Mister Hal," said Dalrymple, "is six dollars all you've—out of the, that cheque?"

"'Fraid so." Hal reached into an inside pocket and brought out the zig-zag length of the railroad ticket, with a couple of pullman slips pinned to the top. Dalrymple looked relieved.

"Oh, but you've got transportation," he said.

"On a train that's now probably simply whooshing through northern Ohio. Here, take 'em, and if you can get an adjustment, credit the Old Man's account, with my compliments."

"If I could—if you'll let me—"

Hal smiled, and his eyes wrinkled in the corners. "You're a h—l of a nice guy, Dimples," he said, 'but I'm so mad—so mad, for the first time in my life, that I wouldn't borrow a Confederate nickel from anybody who paid taxes in the same state with that—that—with my father. He told me—if you'll believe it, Dimples: he told me I knew nothing about money or life or this country or him or myself or modern plumbing or brokers' loans or God-knows-whatnot that's of the most quivering importance to a young man's career. He even made me the simply astounding revelation that I was an only child. Had you heard that, Dimples? He sat there and told me—but what the h—l: you're busy. And I've got to get to the Coast. Bromo-seltzer couldn't make it any worse, could it?"

Dalrymple looked worried, confused, pathetic, and he murmured: "No, no," helplessly. So Hal patted his arm, promised to let him know what happened, and started uptown again.

It was in the subway that he remembered the sign they had laughed at last night. In the West Forties, it was, and if he could remember from which place they had been going to which other place, he would remember the street. "California . . . $33" was the line he recalled, among a list of fares to Chicago, Miami, Detroit, Pittsburgh, and other destinations which he had no faintest desire to reach. "There," Tony had said, grabbing at him; "go out to the Coast that way, boy. Rub elbows with the people: see life; know your native land."

Just west of Broadway—in the Forties. He'd find it: by G—d, he'd find it. He wouldn't borrow a nickel from any one of fifty people who'd lend him money in the next half hour if he went to them. He'd hock something—the curly ugly silver dressing-table set his father had given him. He'd get to the Coast on fifty dollars and tell his father what to do with any insufferable future fight-talks that occurred to him.

CHAPTER II

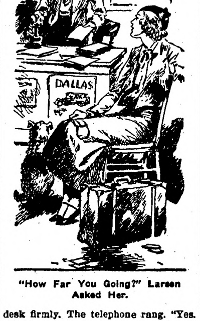
Tuesday

Hal's headache was gone next morning, but so—nearly—was the warming sense of triumph in his inspiration. And that went entirely at nine o'clock when he walked into the bare, dingy, and crowded garage office from which decrepit carsful of share-expense travelers were dispatched about the country. He hadn't stopped to think what the mechanics of the thing might be; but here the possibilities of dreariness seemed promptly infinite. Eight July days of four hundred miles' driving each, through country reputed to be hotter than, outside, Forty-eighth street already promised to be; crowded into an unwashed derelict of a fine car among a selection from this assembly of desolate, if not actively objectionable looking people. . . . The first rough cartoon of these vistas nearly had him back on the street again—to telephone Dalrymple for the easy loan that would put him on this afternoon's Century.

A decent looking man in a clean shirt looked at him across the shabby desk firmly. The telephone rang. "Yes. This is Larsen," said the man, frowning. "Call me later. I'm very busy."



"How Far You Going?" Larsen Asked Her.

Hal upended his old suitcase against the wall near the door and sat on it. Larsen started pawing over the piles of little slips before him. "Now—" he said twice, almost looking up, but each time thinking better of it. Then suddenly, "You can't take that dog." Hal looked around for the dog, then up quickly to examine who it should be in this place with so smartly bred a fox-terrier.

"I've got to take the dog," said the girl in soft, almost-husky gravity. "He'll sit in my lap; he'll be no trouble." Pretty, quite pretty, Hal saw; perhaps a little tough, surely self-conscious—the even solemnity in her large eyes aware that unauthorized people were looking at her, might any minute speak to her and have to be rebuffed. But pretty, really quite pretty.

"How far you going?" Larsen asked her.

"Los Angeles," said the girl steadily.

'Oh," said Larsen, as if Los Angeles were just this side of New Rochelle. "If you keep him in your lap, all right." He turned to the man whose crossed legs Hal could see beyond her. "Does he bite?"

"I don't know," said a lazy, careless voice.

Larsen was startled. "You two're together," he said.

"No," said the man.

Larsen looked at her: she made a slight negative motion with her head and dropped her eyes to the dog. Larsen fumbled through the slips of paper, stopping to frown at one. "You're going to L. A.," he said to the girl. "Yes," she said, barely looking up to him for an instant. "And so are you," Larsen said to the man. "Yes, but I'm not with her." "Then who is?" said Larsen. Hal let half a smile come through his moodiness as he shook his head. And Larsen was saved from further astonishment by his telephone, into which he said again he was very busy, loading three seven-passenger cars for Chi and the West.

Hal's eyes kept coming back to the girl. She seemed not to hear what was going on in the room—stayed quietly, solemnly sure that some one would speak to her. Periodically that annoyed Hal and he looked away. Then he would find himself looking at her again, seeing how the smooth, slight dip of her cheeks under high cheek-bones seemed to be pursing her lips a little, adding solemnity to her wide, possessed mouth.

"Hello, hello," said Larsen impatiently into the telephone: 'I'm very busy. I'm loading seven three-passenger cars for Chi and the West." Larsen was sweating. He called suddenly over his shoulder, as if taking a desperate remedy, "De Soto!" A small, cheerful, soft-eyed man, without a hat and looking as if he had just crawled from under a car, came in expectantly. "Take her bags," said Larsen, pointing his pencil at a woman, "and take her to Dallas." The lady's shocked disapproval of little De Soto lost some of its imperiousness when he grinned at her eagerly and said: "Like a fast ride, lady?" She glared down, her pince-nez quivering. "Hope y'do, 'cause anybody rides with me gets a fast one."

"Now," said Larsen more happily, as if their disappearance made it a family party again. But the telephone rang, and Larsen began his weary piece about Chi and the West almost before he had lifted the receiver. "Now, that dog—" he started again, and Hal saw a sort of quick pride take the girl's face as she raised her head. "No, that's right," Larsen added. "We settled that. We settled about the dog. Now Los Angeles—everybody going to Los Angeles goes with Jake Miller. Miller!" he shouted at the garage door. "Where's Miller?"

After an hour Hal went across the baking street for a glass of ginger ale. When he came back the slight, tidy man smoking beside the doorway gave him a lazy smile and in a voice that was oddly unsure of pitch said, "Goin' to L. A.?"

"Guess so," said Hal, trying to be neither discourteous nor encouraging. The trip was going to be bad enough without entering into relations with anybody.

"So'm I," said the man. "My name's Crack—Mart'n Crack." His eyes seemed dreamily looking for the effect of this on Hal.

Hal leaned against the wall, facing the street, and lighted a cigarette. I'm d—d if I'll offer him my name, Hal said to himself; if he's interested, he heard it in there.

"You any relation to Frederick Ireland—the big shot downtown?"

Hal looked at him with cool amusement in his gray eyes. "Sure," he said. "Couldn't be closer." Crack gave a slight, polite laugh. From his side pocket he drew a bright, new golf ball, dropped it to the pavement where it clicked smartly and leaped up to his waiting hand again.

Hint for Silk and Wool

Never allow silk or wool garments to become very much soiled before washing. If you do it necessitates rubbing to remove the dirt, or using water of too high a temperature. Both heat and rubbing are bad for silk or wool. They both require tepid water and just squeezing up and down in the suds.

LET US MAKE YOUR VACATION TRIP SAFER

BEFORE you start on your vacation trip, let us completely inspect your car. There is no charge for this service and it will assure you of a safer and more enjoyable trip.

For the convenience and safety of car owners Firestone has established more than 500 Auto Supply and Service Stores throughout the country, and thousands of Firestone Dealers are also equipped with complete Auto Supplies and complete Service Departments, to test and service your tires, brakes, batteries, spark plugs, in addition to power lubrication and crank case service.

AVOID THE DANGER OF BLOWOUTS

Firestone removes the danger of blowouts by preventing their main cause—internal friction and heat. This is accomplished by Gum-Dipping.

THERE ARE THREE QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS THAT WILL SOLVE YOUR PROBLEM OF WHAT TIRES TO BUY:

1 "Will the tread give me the greatest traction and protection against skidding?"

— Recent tests by a leading University show that Firestone High Speed Non-Skid Tires stop a car 15% quicker than any other of the leading makes.

For eight consecutive years Firestone Tires have been on the winning car in the dangerous Pike's Peak Race where a skid means death.

2 "Are they blowout-proof?"

—Firestone Gum-Dipped Tires have the most amazing records for being blowout-proof of any tires ever built. In the gruelling 500-Mile Race at Indianapolis, May 30th, every one of the 33 cars was equipped with Firestone Gum-Dipped Tires. Not one of the 33 drivers had tire trouble of any kind.

Ab Jenkins drove his 5,000 pound car on Firestone Gum-Dipped Tires over the hot salt beds of Utah, 3,000 miles, averaging 127.2 miles per hour, with temperatures as high as 120°, without tire trouble of any kind.

3 "Without sacrificing these two important safety features will they give me longer mileage, thus making them the most economical tires I can buy?"

— Firestone High Speed Tires not only give you more than 50% longer wear, but also lowest cost per mile. In fact, unequaled mileage records of thousands of car owners add undisputed evidence of the longer wear and greater economy of Firestone High Speed Tires.

Equip your car with a set of Firestone Gum-Dipped Non-Skid Tires, the safest tires ever built and avoid the dangers of skidding and blowouts.

You Always Get Better Quality at No Higher Price when You Buy a Firestone Tire with the Firestone Name and Guarantee—LIBERAL TRADE-IN ALLOWANCE FROM THESE PRICES

1 University tests show Firestone High Speed Tires stop cars 15 to 25% quicker.
2 Gum-Dipped cords give greater blowout protection. Gum-Dipping is not used in other tires.
3 Wider, flatter tread gives more than 50% longer non-skid wear.

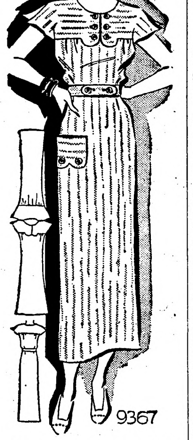
Settles Problem of "Working" Frock

PATTERN 9367



The morning after you start this, you'll be wearing it. It's that quick to make up, so don't waste any time making up your mind to have this for your next "work-a-day" frock! You can't possibly find a simpler pattern—nor more becoming lines—nor "breezier" sleeves. And those are the things that count for something in a kitchen. The nice scallops on the yoke and pocket are the details that so aptly make this frock "different," and the slit sleeve is ready for action. The bosom and back fullness (so much in vogue) does nicely by your femininity. Wear nice bright buttons to match the cotton print you choose.

Pattern 9367 may be ordered only in sizes 14, 16, 18, 20, 32, 34, 36, 38, 40 and 42. Size 16 requires 3 yards 36 inch fabric.

Send FIFTEEN CENTS in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for this pattern. Be sure to write plainly your NAME, ADDRESS, the STYLE NUMBER and SIZE.

Complete, diagrammed sew chart included.

Send your order to Sewing Circle Pattern Department, 232 West Eighteenth street, New York.

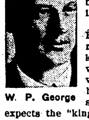
MUSSOLINI CALLS WAR WITH ETHIOPIA UNAVOIDABLE—"REVOLT" IN HOUSE.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD
© Western Newspaper Union.

STANDING atop a cannon, Benito Mussolini told 15,000 Black Shirt volunteers and the world as well that in the matter of Ethiopia "We have decided upon a struggle in which we as a government and a people will not turn back. The decision is irretrievable."



W. P. George

Unless Emperor Haile Selassie gets right down on his knees to Il Duce, the war in his dominion will begin in September when the rainy season ends. No one expects the "king of kings" to submit tamely, so other nations are advising their nationals in Ethiopia to get out of the country. William Perry George, the American charge d'affaires at Addis Ababa, was authorized by the State department to advise American citizens to leave, or take whatever other steps he deemed necessary to protect their safety. Nearly all these Americans are connected with Seventh Day Adventist and United Presbyterian missions.

Mr. George transmitted to the emperor the rather curt reply of the American government to his majesty's appeal for aid in stopping Italy. Secretary of State Hull, writing by authority of the President, told the emperor the United States was "loath to believe" the two countries actually will engage in warfare as they are both signatories of the Kellogg pact. The note also pointed out that the arbitration proceedings might arrive at a satisfactory decision.

The chances that war might be averted by the arbitrators seemed slight. Those gentlemen met again at Scheveningen and their session was disrupted by the Italian representatives when a spokesman for Ethiopia set forth the fact that Ualual, scene of the bloody clash last December, is well within the Ethiopian border.

Apparently the British have given up trying to check Mussolini and are now devoting their efforts to plans for getting British and British Indian subjects out of Addis Ababa on short notice. Troop-carrying planes at Cairo and cruisers, sloops and troop ships at various near east ports were being made ready for this service.

France evidently intends to let Italy go ahead with the Ethiopian adventure, and, like the United States, is not inclined to participate in an economic blockade of Italy such as was unofficially suggested by England.

REVOLT in congress against alleged dictatorial attempts of the administration reached a climax when the house, by the decisive vote of 258 to 148, rejected the "death sentence" in the utility holding companies bill as passed by the senate and demanded by the President. The record vote came on a motion to substitute the house bill placing utility holding companies under regulation of the securities and exchange commission for the senate bill which prescribed the dissolution of the holding companies of more than first degree beginning in 1940.

Rep. Brewster

The adoption of this motion killed the "death sentence." After substituting the house bill for the senate bill, the perfected measure was passed by a vote of 322 to 81.

Immediately after this action, the house voted unanimously for an investigation of alleged lobbying by both the supporters and the foes of the utility measure. During the debate on the bill it was frequently charged that the capitol was swarming with utility company lobbyists, and then came two serious accusations against the other side. Representative John H. Hoeppel of California, Democrat, asserted an unnamed administration lobbyist had offered to get California's relief allotment increased if Hoeppel would vote for the bill as the President wanted it. This didn't greatly impress the house, but later Representative Ralph O. Brewster of Maine, Republican, charged that Thomas G. Corcoran, a young brain truster who is co-author of the administration bill, had threatened cessation of construction of the $37,000,000 Passamaquoddy dam project in the congressman's district if Brewster should vote against the "death sentence."

Mr. Brewster said he did not believe the President was aware that such tactics were being used by his aids or would countenance them, and Rankin of Mississippi and Moran of Maine defended Mr. Roosevelt. But the President's contact man, Charles West, and Postmaster General Farley's lobbyist, Emil Hurja, had been so active among the house members that the resentment of the lawmakers was aroused and they glady directed that the lobbying charges be investigated.

CRITICS of the President's program have made up their minds that he is deliberately building up a "crisis" which will provide excuse for a demand for constitutional amendments in the campaign of 1936. Their conviction was strengthened by Mr. Roosevelt's letter to Congressman Samuel B. Hill, chairman of the interstate commerce subcommittee, urging the passage of the Guffey coal bill regardless of doubts as to its constitutionality.

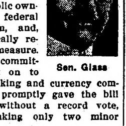
President Roosevelt followed the suggestion of Attorney General Cummings that the legislation should be put through congress because "the situation is so urgent," and that the question of constitutionality should be left up to the courts.

The President, admitting that coal mining is in itself an intrastate transaction, nevertheless wrote that the final test of the validity of the Guffey bill would depend upon whether production conditions directly affect, promote, or obstruct interstate commerce. The Supreme court, in the Schechter NRA case, quoted a previous opinion that mining, manufacturing, and other forms of production were as local in their character as the production of crops, and hence beyond the reach of congress.

THE secretary of the treasury appeared before the house ways and means committee which was trying to formulate the new tax bill wanted by the administration, and declared that, depending on the rates of taxation adopted, the measure might bring in as much as $1,000,000,000 a year or as little as $118,000,000 annually. As the representative of the administration, the young secretary declined to advise as to the rates, though the Republican members of the committee tried to pin him down to details. The legislation outlined by the President includes taxation of inheritances and gifts, higher surtaxes on million dollar incomes and graduated income taxes on corporations. It is believed the committee's bill will not go outside these limits.

Senator Charles L. McNary of Oregon, Republican leader, predicted that congress either would recess and reconvene in the fall or would put off enactment of the tax bill until the session beginning January 3 next.

IN THE battle between Senator Carter Glass and Marriner S. Eccles, governor of the federal reserve board, the former has, at this writing, scored the most points. The astute Virginian extracted from the Eccles-Currie banking bill most of the radical provisions that would have led to government or public ownership of the federal reserve system, and, indeed, practically rewrote the measure. Then his subcommittee handed it on to the senate banking and currency committee, which promptly gave the bill its approval, without a record vote, and after making only two minor changes.



Sen. Glass

Governor Eccles and Secretary of the Treasury Morganthau expected to be called before the committee and were prepared to tell why the bill would not suit the administration, but the committee didn't give them a chance.

As passed by the house, the banking bill would give autocratic powers over the banking system to a politically dominated federal reserve board; and the party in power would have the authority to force the twelve reserve banks to lend unlimited amounts to the national treasury. Under the bill as rewritten by Glass, reserve board members are to be appointed for 14-year terms and are to be discharged only for cause; chief officers of the reserve banks are to be chosen by their directors, subject to reserve board approval, for five-year periods, and the reserve banks need not buy additional government bonds unless they choose to do so.

CLEVELAND, OHIO, was the scene of a second "grass roots" convention of Republicans, the six states participating being Michigan, Ohio, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Kentucky and Tennessee. "To revitalize interest in the party" was declared the purpose of the meeting by George H. Bender of Ohio, permanent chairman. The attendance was large and enthusiastic and the resolutions adopted, like those of the Springfield conference, denounced the New Deal and called the voters to the defense of the country's Constitution and free institutions.

Under the surface there was a good deal of irritation, for the old timers in the party organization feared to lose their influence, perhaps with reason.

HUEY LONG'S conquest of Louisiana was completed when the legislature gave final approval to 25 bills designed to destroy local political patronage in the state and otherwise to strengthen the senator's dominance. He now has in hand all the weapons he needs for the elimination of Mayor T. Semmes Walmsley of New Orleans and his followers.

OUR army lost an able and distinguished officer in the death of Maj. Gen. Stuart Heintzelman at the army and navy hospital in Hot Springs, Ark. The grandson and son of army officers, General Heintzelman was graduated from West Point in 1899. After service in the Philippines and China he was sent to France as an observer, and when America entered the war he held high staff assignments. He won the D. S. M. and was decorated by France and Italy. From the inception of the CCC General Heintzelman was in charge of federal reclamation projects in Missouri until last February, when he was given command of the Seventh corps area.

Scientist Claims That Noises Can Be Deadly

Do women make more noise than motor cars?

According to an American professor of physics, yes. Giving evidence in an action to restrain a factory from making an excessive amount of noise, he described experiments with a sound meter which he had carried out in the district. These showed that women talking in their homes made 40 times more noise than the factory, and 50 per cent more noise than passing cars.

Apparently women talk more loudly in America, for experiments in this country show "loud conversation" as only double the noise of a suburban street, and two-thirds that of a pneumatic drill at 20 feet distance.

But the worst noise of all, according to one distinguished scientist, is one we can't hear. A few months ago he showed the congress of radio biology how ultra-sound waves could burn the fingers of a man holding a glass tube, although the tube itself was not heated. He claimed that it was possible to be killed by these vibrations, which were really sounds, although they could not be perceived by the naked ear.—London Answers.

Alaska Breaks Its Own Record

Cans More Salmon Than In The Peak Year 1926

HOUSEWIVES will be glad to hear that the largest annual amount of canned salmon ever produced in Alaska has just been reported to the Bureau of Fisheries, Department of Commerce. The total pack of 7,481,830 cases of all species of salmon, shows an increase of 2,256,226 cases over the 1933 pack and exceeds the largest previous pack, that of 1926, by over 800,000 cases.

The following sentence from the report will also be of interest to housewives who have a preference for a particular species of salmon: "With the exception of kings, which declined 10 per cent, all species showed increases over the 5-year average, as follows: cohoes, about 20 per cent; chums, 6 per cent; pinks, 47 per cent; and reds, 54 per cent."

Substitute for High-Priced Meat

Added importance is given to this news item, because of the fact that with the present shortage of two and a half billion pounds of meat in America, the price of meat has risen 41.5% since February 1933, according to a report of the United States Department of Commerce. Owing to its high protein content, the alternative to high-priced meat is fish, so the present abundance of salmon is expected to reduce household food budgets to a considerable extent.

Fish has been found of vital importance in the diet, not only for its protein content but also for its tendency to ward off anemia, goitre, rickets and other ills. Salmon is the canned fish consumed in the greatest quantity. After it come tuna, sardines, shrimp, mackerel, clams and oysters.

Fish is the easiest of all flesh foods to digest because it contains no gristle, tough muscle or connective tissue, which are difficult to masticate and resistant to digestive juices. Fish flesh is tender because fish do not have to support their body weight, but, instead, are buoyed up by the water in which they swim. They require no heavy bony framework or tough sinews and strong muscles to support them. At this season of the year, when easily digestible foods are in demand, this fact is of particular importance.

This unusually large pack of salmon, at low prices, affords an opportunity for housewives to cut their food costs and at the same time serve a variety of delicious dishes, for salmon has a wide variety of uses.

Smart New Ways With Salmon

Salads and sandwiches, particularly in demand at this season, are attractive as well as delicious when made with salmon. The current use of cress, instead of lettuce, gives a pleasing color contrast with salmon and also enhances its taste in salads, sandwiches and canapes.

Smart ways of preparing baked and scalloped salmon for the main dish of the meal are constantly being devised by dietitians, owing to the demand of modern hostesses for these healthful and delicious dishes. Most of these require only the addition of a savory sauce, such as Hollandaise, Bechamel or Maitre d'Hotel sauce, and a few minutes in the oven.

Tuna fish is also delectable prepared with these sauces, baked in the oven and topped with grated cheese to add color and distinctive flavor. Many housewives are now stocking up with a plentiful supply of salmon, while the prices are low, and also adding sufficient tuna to vary the fish menus.*

Through the noise of the rumbling traffic came the screams of a terrified mother. Her child had been added to the toll of auto accidents. The driver of the car had been drinking. An innocent life snuffed out by a "driving fool".

Laws in most states require that the driving license be removed when this condition existts. That law should be enforced to the letter. I also recommend a prison sentence in addition to a removal of license. The drunken game of automobile driving has gone too far.

Many drunken drivers have been fined and worned not to do it again. Think of it! A drunken driver running up and down the streets and highways and endangering the lives of people, set down with only a fine. Stop him. Send him to prison. It's the only answer.

Let us remove this type of reckless driver. Let us make the highways safe for our children.

Prefer Acreage Adjustment

Requests of northwestern and midwestern farmers for government loans on rye and wheat so far have failed to gain the favor of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, says Andrew Boss, University Farm, St. Paul, state director of AAA programs in Minnesota.

Rather, he asserts, this agency prefers to increase benefit payments to farmers who cooperate in holding down their acreages of these commodities, if the supply, because of abnormally high yields, should depress prices unduly.

This policy has already been adopted in the case of wheat, he points out, on which adjustment payments have been increased from 29 cents a bushel in 1934 to 33 cents a bushel this year. Adjustment payments will also be made on rye this year, fon the first time.

Details of the new wheat and rye adjustment contracts are now being worked out by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, following conferences with representative producers of these commodities in Washington early this month. The wheat contract, which will follow the one now in effect but expiring when the 1935 crop is harvested, will probably be ready to offer farmers early in August and the rye contract later the same month. Present indications are that both contracts will run for four years, unless ended before that time by a referendum of the growers. The administrative work of the two programs in each county will probably be handled by one production control association.

The request for government loans on rye was formulated by 150 farmers from 20 Minnesota counties and one North Dakota state representative in a conference at St. Cloud June 29. The question of adopting a loan program for wheat was discussed informally in a conference attended by farm leaders of eight midwestern states and representatives of the federal government at Des Moines, Iowa, June 12. Interest in these loans is a direct outgrowth of the producers' fears that the production of these commodities this year may exceed the effective demand and so depress the prices of all cash and feed grains.

Fast Freight Derailed

A westbound freight train of the Canadian National Railway, comprising 32 oil and freight cars, cracked up near Swift, Minnesota, about seven miles east of Warroad late Friday, causing about $200,000 in damage to freight when the oil tanks burst into flames. No one was injured.

The derailment was caused by breaking of a coupling on the fourth car behind the engine. The break caused the front truck of the fifth car to jump the track, throwing the three oil cars into the ditch where they burst into flames.

Work Or Get Off Relief Rolls

This is the ultimatum issued by L. P. Zimmernan, acting administrator, SERA, in declaring that any person on relief who refuses to accept a private job will automatically be removed from the state relief lists.

"Farmers are experiencing difficulty in getting harvest hands", he said. "Reports have come to me that many persons on relief have refused work on private jobs. We will not tolerate such a condition in Minnesota. If a man does not choose to work we will not choose to feed him or his family.

In making this statement Mr. Zimmerman pointed out that if the job is temporary the person will be re-admitted to the relief rolls upon its completion and that if the wages do not equal the amount of the dole the difference will be made up thru the budget deficiency allowance.

"The purpose of the new Works Progress Administration program is to get people off the relief rolls and into private employment", he said. "Right now Minnesota farmers are crying for harvest hands and there are thousands of eligible men on relief capable of working in the fields. Through the county social service workers and the various employment offices we will be able to keep close observation of every relief client offered a job. The government is not disposed to feed a person unwilling to accept employment."

Farmers Race With The Sun

Minnesota farmers and an army of hired hands raced this week against the sun to harvest the 1935 grain crops.

The Associated Press reported that fields in the entire Midwest were alive with men and machines working desperately against time to cut the rapidly ripening grain before the heads "shatter" and drop the bare kernels.

The men labored in the dazzling sunlight and continued on into the night, in some states, by artificial light.

Unusual weather conditions bunched the farmers' work this year. Cool weeks in spring and early summer retarded maturing of grain, but good rains assured heavy stands. Recent hot weather brought along all crops with a rush.

SYNOPSIS

Following his father's bitter criticism of his idle life, and the withdrawal of financial assistance, Hal Ireland, only son of a wealthy banker, finds himself practically without funds but with the promise of a situation in San Francisco, which city he must reach, from New York, within a definite time limit. He takes passage with a cross-country auto party on a "share expense" basis.

"'Sfunny," he said, "how that Larsen thought I was with the chippy, wasn't it?"

"How do you know she's a chippy?" said Hal in spontaneous irritation.

"She looks it, doesn't she?" said Crack, his lazy amiability undismayed.

"No," said Hal, promptly hoping to confirm that she didn't.

There was another pause—apparently serene for Crack but oddly irksome for Hal. A truck passing in the street shot out a violent backfire opposite them; Hal started all through his body, and glanced at the man again. Crack was in complete, indolent repose still, his quiet look barely stirred by a hint of sly mischief—as if he had caused that sudden explosion to confirm some lazy guess about Hal.

He stepped confidentially to Hal's side of the door and said in a low tone: "See that big bird standin' at the back there? He's a dick. A detective."

Hal raised his eyebrows perfunctorily before he said, "How d'you know that?"

"I thought he was," Crack said, "and then I saw his badge."

"H'm," said Hal.

Crack smiled and, except for a vague, drowsy speculation in his eyes, his smile was youthful, halfway candid, not unengaging. "He's not looking for you, is he?" he said, cocking his head a very little.

"If he were, he shouldn't have much trouble finding me; and I'd be an ass to tell you anyway, wouldn't I?"

Crack's smile sobered just a shadow. After a while he said, "Think she's going to Hollywood?" It happened to be precisely what Hal was moodily wondering, and he was startled into a shrewder look at Crack.

"Wouldn't be surprised," he said, and wished he hadn't been trapped even into that much interest.

"She's got a good figure," said Crack speculatively. "I like sorta broad shoulders and nice clean-cut ankles on a babe, don't you?"

"Hadn't thought," Hal murmured straight ahead of him, angry and a little ashamed that this shy-mannered stranger should mention the very things he looked for first in any girl.

Hal snapped his cigarette into the gutter and went inside to sit on his suitcase again. The girl hadn't altered her position of solemn, en-garde waiting. But the terrier stretched luxuriously—leaning 'way forward with his hind legs straight out and his chin stretched up. The stretch broke into a friendly grin and a wagging of the docked tail when he met Hal's eyes. Hal smiled, winked, and held out his hand. The dog came stepping forward to the end of his lead and put a cold nose against Hal's fingers. The girl's head turned quickly; Hal saw that her solemn eyes were large and of a deep, yellowed-flecked blue—also that they were alive with the beginnings of defensive hostility; at once she pulled the dog back and looked away.

You can go to the devil, Hal said to himself—you and your broad shoulders and your slim ankles; I hope Martin Crack makes you and makes you like it.

A little after eleven, some luggage—two veteran suitcases, a cardboard hatbox already losing the rim of its lid and a dress-box tied up with two kinds of string—arrived from the Grand Central. It was the work of but fifteen minutes more for Larsen to find Jake Miller in the garage behind the office and start him loading. Miller's car was a large Packard sedan of another decade with paint stained and lusterless as the garage floor, a diagonal of adhesive tape across the dull windshield, and all the nickel-work the color of old and unloved pewter.

Miller's futile hand unfolded an immense trunk rack on the back, took out a tarpaulin and began spreading it with care over two oil puddles on the garage floor. On this he stacked the luggage with what seemed accidental neatness and lashed the tarpaulin around it with clothesline.

Added to everything else, thought Hal, he'll go sound asleep at the wheel and run us into somebody's house.

"How many passengers have you got?" Hal asked when the luggage was up.

"Seven," said Miller.

"Six besides yourself, 'cy?" said Hal, thinking, Oh good G—d!

"Seven," Miller repeated. "Got a invention. Got a seat stands on a box between the jump-seats." He chuckled as if he had outwitted some one. "I'll show it to you."

"I guess I'll see it soon enough," said Hal. "What are we waiting for now?"

"Nothin'," said Miller, grinning.

"Well, where's everybody else?"

"In the office, reckon."

"How about loading 'em in and starting?"

Miller chuckled again. "Guess we might's well."

Hal leaned against a pillar of the garage—hands in side pockets, quick, sure eyes brooding, mouth moodily set between the lean lines of his cheeks—and watched them file in, his "companions" for an eight-day July ride through country which he vaguely conceived as the flat, dusty setting for midwestern novels.

First came Mr. and Mrs. Pulsipher—she almost scuttling, like a brood hen who knows that in another moment panic will be at her heels, and he following close with lanky bewilderment and the short steps of someone being pushed from behind. They hurried into the back seat.

Then came the nun, who had sat cool and unmoving all this time in a corner of the office, her tranquil face patient, faintly sad, and immaculate as its tight white framing. And then came Miller, stuffing soiled money into his soiled wallet; and then Martin Crack, looking like an ambitionless, easily pleased countryman except for the special tidiness of his thinning hair and the lazy speculation under his blue eyes. After him came the girl, and Hal realized that, without knowing it, he had been waiting to see her walk. It had the grace that comes from unconsciousness of effect, the charm that is near awkwardness, like the walk of a long-legged boy, suggestive of inquiry, of expectance.

You can still go to the devil, Hal thought, but if you walk to him that way, I shall watch you with admiration.

But he wished Crack hadn't said that about broad shoulders and slim ankles.

"The ladies usually starts off in back," Miller said and waited for Pulsipher to lunge forward abruptly and abandon his injured wife.

The nun got in and the girl. The dog wasn't so keen about the idea, and he growled ominously as Crack stooped to help him. And then Hal saw that another man had come—a bulky, ruddy, tough-cheeked man of perhaps fifty, in a pepper-and-salt suit, no waistcoat, gay bow tie, and panama hat.

There Was Something Funny About the Unreality of the Thing.

Miller surveyed him with a half-smile in his sleepiness and said, "You're biggest: you better get in front." And he added a drowsy "Hey" for Hal.

Crack got into the farther jump-seat, Pulsipher took the invention next him, and Hal cramped himself in last. There was a slamming of doors, and the oppression of the eight days ahead, crowded among these dull and mutually distrustful strangers, was shut into the close, dusty-mohair atmosphere. Miller leaned over the wheel as if he were already going very fast, and dragged back the lever noisily. The engine gave a first tug against its load, moved it, gathered sudden momentum, and plunged with venerable eagerness down the ramp into the hazy heat of Forty-eighth street.

Score for the first speech of the trip went to Mrs. Pulsipher; time: ten minutes. Passing the long, stone-faced docks with sunlit masts and flags and funnels visible over them, she suddenly announced, "That's where the boat goes to Europe."

The burly man in the front seat turned slowly and suspiciously round, a fresh but unheeded cigarette puffing and joggling at the side of his lips as he said, "Which boat, ma'am?"

"All the boats—to Europe," said Mrs. Pulsipher, her manner implying she hadn't been speaking to him.

The man edged himself sidewise, with his arm along the back of the seat, and looked at her with a scholar's potential respect.

"You've been to Europe," he stated.

"No," said Mrs. Pulsipher severely. "But we've been in New York two weeks and my son-in-law from Bridgeport showed us all over and showed us where the boat goes to Europe. This is where it goes from."

"I believe you, mam," said the man, his deep voice quiet and respectful. "It's very interesting. My name is Kerrigan—Giles Kerrigan. I am looking forward to this journey, but I judge we're mostly strangers. Let us have introductions." His unsmiling look continued past Hal in the direction of Mrs. Pulsipher.

"Mrs. Ella Pulsipher," she said, la severely: "and that's John Pulsipher, my husband."

"You're from Iowa, mam," said Kerrigan.

"Yes," said Mrs. Pulsipher, interested beyond distrust now. "Burbank. How did you guess?"

"Los Angeles is the capital of Iowa, mam," said Kerrigan solemnly, "and I was told this crate—this car was going there." Hal thought, the man's probably a nut. Kerrigan went on: "I vote for you for chaperon of this emigration, Mrs. P. Will you get us the names of the other ladies?"

There was a moment of silence and then a very soft, careful, faintly foreign voice behind Hal said, "I am Sister Anastasia." It was surprisingly beautiful to hear her say "Ahna-stahzia." Hal looked up at the duplicate rear-vision-mirror to see if the Trafford girl's expression was as soft and gentle as that name, but he could see only her clear, possessed profile and the brief flow of golden hair under the protective rim of her blue hat.

Go ahead, look like that: somebody's going to speak to you now.

But her barely pursed lips parted in a slight smile when Mrs. Pulsipher said, "And your name, young lady?" "Trafford," said the girl, in a tone nearer huskiness than you expected: "Barry Trafford." "Barry?" said Mrs. Pulsipher. "That sounds like a man's name." "I know," said the girl quietly; "my father liked it."

"And did well to," said Kerrigan in grave courtliness, "if you'll allow me."

Hal saw her head turn, saw her blue eyes large and solemn but not hostile as she said, "Thank you." Even without looking in the mirror, he was conscious of her—both in it and behind him. Relax, you, d—n it, relax: I won't speak to you.

Martin Crack announced himself then, with a lazy sort of modesty neither amiable nor otherwise, and Kerrigan looked at Hal.

"Henry Ireland," said Hal, trying to match the humorlessness of the brown, sedate eyes, even as he wondered if he really saw deep in them a flicker of something youthful and eager.

Mrs. Pulsipher tumbled quick words at him from behind: "Any relation to that Frederick Ireland, that banker, that Ireland who's president of that big bank here?" Hal turned his head as far as he could without moving his body. "Oh, yes," he said. "Eldest and favorite son."

Gaunt John Pulsipher, racked by some surprising and hampered eagerness, began to stammer, quick, unconvincing laughter in his throat, until he snapped his lean fingers; then he said, "He-he-he-he ain't got but the one son."

"That would still leave me eldest," said Hal drily.

Pulsipher's earnestness slowly faded; he blushed, tried to smile, dropped his eyes, and murmured, "I thought you was foolin'."

Hal glanced into the mirror and a slight, wry satisfaction stirred his lips; the Trafford girl's eyes—not meeting his—were angry as when she had pulled her dog back from him, angrier, perhaps, for the knowledge that he was looking at her reflection and smiling to himself. He hoped so.

"And our pilot," Kerrigan said, gesturing briefly with a strong, not ungraceful hand: "Mr. Jake (Ace) Miller." Miller grinned.

"I always think," said Mrs. Pulsipher, with resumed severity, "that when strangers come together, it's nice to try to make everything pleasant as they can for each other. It's not hard to be nice."

"It must be hard for some people," said Barry Trafford's low voice.

"Maybe it is," Mrs. Pulsifer agreed, grimly pleased. "It's too bad if it's that way, too. They miss so much for themselves."

"They think it's the others who're missing it, so I s'pose that makes it even," said Barry.

Hal chuckled inside: That's the girl; but I'll make you madder than that, too. And before we get to Los Angeles, possibly you'll be sorry for it.

He looked at Kerrigan. The brown eyes were thinly sedate over wise sparks of laughter; and then one eyelid flicked down and up, quick as a camera shutter.

There was something funny about the unreality of the thing. Hal had to believe New Jersey and the hot sun and the unyielding lumpiness of the seat; but he couldn't believe anything beyond that, couldn't visualize the journey's ever getting farther than New Jersey. He couldn't believe that these seven other people, close and real and hot around him now, would stay real; nor that his mood, mixed of defiance, impatience, and anger with himself for getting into such a joyless state, would stay real; nor that his vivid sense of the girl's well-formed, hostile presence behind him would. Yet the journey and its days undoubtedly lay ahead; and it couldn't stay as it was now. A continuance of that was patently too fantastic to credit, for eight days, for eight hours even. The son of Frederick Ireland coasting on his father's name! Good old Frederick Ireland.

At least he had pretty well settled that they'd leave him alone now. Pulsipher had retired into humble perplexity, and there was no one on the running board to talk to Hal through the window. The restraint he seemed to have imposed upon the sociability of the load might wear off; or he'd get used to it.

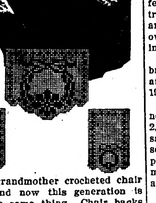
"WREATH DESIGN" FOR CHAIR BACK

By GRANDMOTHER CLARK



Your grandmother crocheted chair backs, and now this generation is doing the same thing. Chair backs and arm rests are strictly modern. When you enter a room the chair with crocheted set attracts your attention first. It is distinctive and really looks good. The wreath shown above is made in the large filet stitch; shows up more lacy and the work is completed in less time. Other designs in chair backs have been shown in past editions, and judging from the response for directions how to make them we feel sure this design will bring equally large requests. The home needleworkers know what to make to improve home decorations.

Instructions and black and white diagram how to make this set will be mailed upon receipt of 10c. If you want the complete package No. 2505 containing sufficient cream Mountain Craft cotton, crochet hook, directions and diagram, send this department 40c and you will receive it by mail.

Mind's Possibilities

The mind is invincible when she turns to herself, and relies upon her own courage. . . . What then must her strength be when she is fortified with reason, and engages upon thought and deliberation?—From the writings of Marcus Aurelius.

Figures Reveal Marked Decline in Birthrate

The United States is fast becoming a nation of oldsters, Dr. O. E. Baker of the bureau of agricultural economics reports.

With fewer births every year and immigration constantly lessened, "there are now about 10 per cent fewer young children in the country than there were five years ago and about 17 per cent more persons over sixty-five years of age," according to Doctor Baker.

Continuation of this trend will bring about a decreased population after the 10-year period ending in 1945, the doctor predicts.

"Decline in births has been from nearly 3,000,000 in 1921 to about 2,300,000 in 1934," Doctor Baker said, but added: "A temporary blossoming in 1933 of many marriages postponed because of the depression might have caused more than the average number of births in 1933."

However, he said, weddings in 1934 were back to pre-depression numbers and "births seem unlikely to increase after 1935."

The birth decline is greater in cities than in rural areas, the investigator found, because of the greater monetary outlay necessary to raise a child in the city.

The most backward group about having children is the "so-called middle and upper classes." Doctor Baker decides:

"Families of professional classes have 5 to 10 per cent fewer children than those of business men, business men about 25 per cent fewer than skilled workmen and skilled workmen 80 per cent fewer than unskilled laborers."

ADVERTISEMENTS Are Your Guides to Value
● Experts can roughly estimate the value of a product by looking at it. More accurately, by handling and examining it. Its appearance, its texture, the "feel" and the balance of it, all mean something to their trained eyes and fingers.
● But no one person can be an expert on steel, brass, wood, leather, foodstuffs, fabrics, and all of the material that makes up a list of personal purchases. And even experts are fooled, sometimes, by concealed flaws and imperfections.
● There is a surer index of value than the senses of sight and touch . . . knowledge of the maker's name and for what it stands. Here is the most certain method, except that of actual use, for judging the value of any manufactured goods. Here is the only guarantee against careless workmanship, or use of shoddy materials.

TRADE TREATY WITH RUSSIA STIRS SHARP ATTACK ON SECRETARY HULL.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

©. Western Newspaper Union.

TWENTY months of apparently futile moves to revitalize the commercial relations between the United States and Russia, and then suddenly Washington announces that the two nations had concluded a one-year trade agreement under which the Soviet Republics agreed to increase their American imports by 150 per cent. In return for purchases of $30,000,000 worth of American goods Russia is to be granted wide tariff concessions by the United States.

Secretary Hull

Russia will buy railroad equipment, machinery for making new automobile models and other products of heavy industry. In addition the Soviets will buy cotton. The railroad equipment is needed badly for modernization of a weak transportation system.

In return Russia expects to sell sausage casings, certain grades of iron ore, manganese, furs and dairy products in large quantities to the United States.

The pact, concluded by the exchange of notes between Ambassador Bullitt in Moscow and Maxim Litvinov, commissar for foreign affairs, provides for no further loans to Russia and makes no mention of the more than $700,000,000 in debts contracted by former Russian governments. It is in line with Secretary Hull's policy of trade agreements. For these two reasons especially it is attacked by many Republicans and not a few Democrats in congress. Senator Pat McCarren of Nevada was one of the angriest of these gentlemen. He declared Secretary Hull was a "prize diplomatic dupe" and announced that he would demand an immediate modification of the reciprocal tariff act to rescind powers under which Hull is negotiating such treaties. Key Pittman, chairman of the senate foreign relations committee, also is earnestly opposed to Hull's trade program.

WHEN one witness before the house ways and means committee, opposing the President's new tax program, called congress a "rubber stamp," Chairman Doughton and other Democrats declared they had been insulted and would hear no more from the witness. Nearly every one else they heard was as insistent in denouncing the proposed tax bill but more tactful. Most of them represented various sections of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States. Then the committee apparently decided that it really would be a rubber stamp, for it quit work on the tax measure for the time being and, according to report, left the writing of it to certain brain trustees of the Treasury department. The public hearings had been noisy, full of bickerings and probably of no use whatever.

Administration leaders then began planning for postponement of the proposed tax legislation until the winter session. It was said President Roosevelt had consented to this course provided a bill can be agreed upon before adjournment that shall be acceptable to all the groups whose objective is redistribution of wealth by taxation.

The prospect of an early adjournment was so pleasing to the house that one member, Deen of Georgia, was given a veritable ovation when he made a speech telling how tired the legislators were.

FIFTY thousand dollars was appropriated by the house for investigation by the rules committee of lobbying for and against bills affecting utilities interests. Representative Rankin of Mississippi declared that Representative O'Connor of New York, chairman of the committee, was unfit to conduct the inquiry because he was antagonistic to the administration. O'Connor, rising to reply, was given an ovation by the house, and promised the investigation would be thorough and impartial.

T. G. Corcoran

Already the committee has begun its work, the first witness being Representative Brewster of Maine, who declared Thomas G. Corcoran, New Deal lawyer, had tried to force him to vote for the "death sentence" provision in the utilities bill by threats of stopping work on the Passamaquoddy project. Corcoran was then put on the stand and denied the main features of Brewster's story, whereupon the Maine congressman shouted, "You're a liar." Corcoran explained with facility his activities in behalf of the utilities measure. He said he was assigned to help with the original drafting of the bill "through a direct request from the President." Senators Wheeler and Rayburn, he said, asked him to help bring about passage of the bill.

UNOFFICIALLY and informally, the general opinion seems to be that the Wagner labor disputes act is unconstitutional and will be so declared by the United States Supreme court when that tribunal is called on for a decision. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, urges labor leaders to pay no attention to claims that the law is invalid.

"Leading legal authorities of the nation are of the opinion that the act is Constitutional in every respect," he wrote, but added in a letter that he expects a court test and that the American Federation of Labor will get "the best legal talent."

Even if the Wagner law is knocked out by the Supreme court, the administration believes it has a plan that will avert at least 90 per cent of the usual number of strikes, walk-outs, lock-outs and other disorders. It is being launched in Toledo, Ohio, and has been called the "Toledo plan" because it was conceived by Assistant Secretary of Labor Edward F. McGrady when he was trying to settle a dispute in that Ohio city.

It has no sectional characteristics; carries no federal compulsion, and rests solely upon the willingness of workers and employers in every city that adopts the plan, to abandon the harsh economic weapons of old and substitute peaceful discussion for violence.

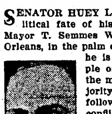
Mr. McGrady explained the plan this way:

A panel of business and labor leaders of equal number is chosen with a federal official to act as chairman. This official presumably would be one who has made a record in the regional labor service setup under the national labor relations board.

The employer would continue to bargain with his workers as usual. In event of a disagreement between them the workers agree not to strike and the employer agrees not to lock out or discriminate against the men as the issue is carried to the panel.

This group debates the problem and if it is unable to agree the heads of the business and labor representatives on the panel and the federal chairman continue seeking an avenue of settlement. If they are unable to agree then an appeal is made direct to the owner of the business involved and the head of the union controlling the workers.

SENATOR HUEY LONG has the political fate of his chief opponent, Mayor T. Semmes Walmsley of New Orleans, in the palm of his hand. But he is forcing the people of the city to put the mayor out. A majority of Walmsley's followers, tired of the conflict, formally deserted him when the commission council adopted a resolution endorsing recent statements of two commissioners calling for the city to make peace with Long. The mayor, standing almost alone, declined to yield. He told the council he "would not deal with men who have been called 'crooks and thieves' by every member of the commission council."



T. Semmes Walmsley

In a caucus preceding the council session, 13 of Walmsley's 17 ward leaders voted for his resignation "for the good of the city." The mayor told them he was "going to stick from h—l to breakfast." Senator Long received a committee of the seceders and said he would call a session of the state legislature to force Walmsley out of office within 24 hours after the "old regulars" obtained approval of a majority of the city's voters for a petition requesting the mayor's removal.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT led various of his cabinet members, leaders of the majority in congress and captains of the New Deal on a week-end outing that was at once dubbed "the kiss and make up excursion." For a lot of these men had been snarling at one another in the physical and political heat of recent days in Washington and the Chief Executive evidently thought it time the quarreling was ended. The entire bunch went to Jefferson Island in Chesapeake bay, Mr. Roosevelt on his yacht Sequoia and the others on a fleet of boats.

Cabinet members included were Vice President Garner, Postmaster General Farley, Attorney General Cummings, Secretary of the Interior Ickes, Secretary of War Dern, and Secretary of Commerce Roper. Speaker Byrns headed a congressional delegation including Senators Tydings, Pittman, Robinson, Copeland, Dieterich, Walsh, Gerry, Duffy, and Radcliffe.

Relief Director Hopkins, No. 1 Brain Truster Tugwell, and Treasury General Counsel Oliphant also were in the party.

NEWSPAPERS of northern Italy intimated that Premier Mussolini might abandon his projected war with Ethiopia if he could find a way of backing out without losing face. But the Roman public was quite sure the duce's aggressive policy would be unimpaired. This opinion was strengthened by the sending of more troops to East Africa.

Secretary of State Hull entered the picture again with a rather mild statement expressing America's abhorrence of war and confidence in the Kellogg pact. The Italians didn't like this at all.

WHEN Chinese rivers overflow they do the thing in a big way. The Han, which joins the Yangtse near Hankow, broke through the dikes and rushed through the densely populated land, drowning about 10,000 men, women and children. The city of Hankow was imperiled and soldiers and civilians were working desperately to keep the levees from breaking.

SMALL NEED YET TO WORRY ABOUT ICE RECESSION

It appears that our refrigerating plant is breaking down. The matter of the receding polar ice cap has for a long time engaged the attention of scientists. Within recent times the recession of the cap has been of such proportions that evidence of it has been observed within the span of only a few decades.

For instance, the Russian Arctic expert, N. G. Datsky, in re-examining areas surveyed 40 years before, found that in Siberia, where his predecessor, Professor Shrenk, found eternal frost at the depth of two meters, there was now no frost at any depth, not even in the marshes. In other localities, where Professor Shrenk found only shrubless tundra, Mr. Datsky saw new growths of timber!

Only recently, Prof. R. T. Belknap of the University of Michigan came upon a pyramid of rocks and a note originally placed at the foot of the Cornell glacier by the late Professor Tarr. The note was dated 1896. In the time intervening, the glacier had moved back three-quarters of a mile from the marker.

R. F. Griggs of the University of Washington tells us that in the Alaskan tundra country* the forest line is advancing at the rate of a mile a century. Trees are now growing on land which had been barren for 100,000 years.

If this keeps on, you say, Hudson bay will eventually become a sub-tropical body of water. Well, what of it? It has been several times before, and, if geological evidence is anything to draw conclusions from, it will be again.

According to W. J. Humphries of the United States weather bureau, if all the ice of the polar caps melted, the ocean levels would be raised 151 feet! And that's something else to try out on the slide rule.—Earl Chapin in Forum and Century.

Chicago Once Coral Reef

Chicago, known to the world as the windy city, was once a "South Sea paradise," but that was 400,000,000 years ago at least. This is the claim which is advanced by the Field Museum of Natural History in an article in its bulletin, which describes Chicago's site as once having been a coral reef, submerged under the waters of a great interior sea.

What, No Skeeters There

Disease-bearing mosquitoes are virtually unknown in the Florida Everglades.

Pineapple Prospers

ONLY prosperous people could afford to eat pineapple before the invention of canning. Poets used it as a symbol for the rare and luxurious—but kings and millionaires ate it. Balzac devised a scheme for getting rich by raising pineapple under glass, in the Paris suburbs, but the pineapples let him down. They preferred Hawaiian sunshine.

Today, however, pineapples have become so prosperous that they can afford to contribute their gold to all—the gold of health and appetite. On the sunny salt-breeze isles of Hawaii they ripen in such abundance that canners can afford to gather only the very best of the fine crop, pack them in cans and send them to us at exceedingly low cost.

Share Their Wealth

To keep pace with the prosperity of pineapple, dietitians are devising new ways to use them, so that they may continue to bring their wealth to our table. Perhaps you will say, "They are so delicious just as they come from the can—why bother to prepare them otherwise?"

The answer is—variety. Use them just as they come from the can for breakfast fruit, and you will find that, prepared in one of the delicious new forms, you will be ready for them again in a dinner salad, with meats, or as a dessert.

Two Top-Notchers

There is an East Indian Shrimp Salad, for example, which combines crushed pineapple with shredded cabbage, moistened with mayonnaise and seasoned with curry powder—all neatly stuffed in ripe tomatoes, over the edge of which fresh or canned shrimps are hooked. Add this to your pineapple repertoire and see how rich you feel!

There's a dessert, too, that's quick as a wink to prepare—and so good. Just sauté sponge cake to a nice brown, add drained diced pineapple and sugar to the pan, sauté a few moments longer and when slightly golden in color, pour it over the sponge cake, topped with plenty of whipped cream. It's extraordinary! *

Safetygrams
BY FRED W. BRAUN
The Safety Man

The average automobile driver climbs into an automobile and starts out, and by the time he has driven 100 miles he thinks he is competent. If you should say to him, "Do you know anything about the traffic laws?", he would reply, "Oh, sure, I know them; I know how to drive".

The man who has driven a couple of years will say, "I know how to drive - - know all there is to know about it." Most of them think they are perfectly capable of handling their automobiles in safety, and that no mere study of the traffic laws will help them.

Know the law. Study the traffic requirements and regulations. They are put there for your use and should be followed out and obeyed to secure maximum efficiency and safety for yourself, the other fellow, and the pedestrian. Automobile drivers ought to, of course, obey the law; and it is the business of the police department to get them to do it.

Carl Fredrickson, son of Mrs. Laura Frebrickson of Holt and Miss Pearl Hanson, daughter of Mrs. Halvor Hanson of Middle River were married at a public wedding before a crowd of several thousand people at the evening shows at the Pennington County Fair at Thief River Falls on Friday evening. The Ernie Young shows playing a special attraction, "Around the World" reveu at the fair furnished the setting for the wedding and members of the revue cast were attendants. A gift of money was presented the couple by the fair association and merchants of Thief River Falls donated numerous household items.

The groom has steady employment as a clerk at the Chas. Leiberman clothing establishment in that city. The News joins their many friends in wishing them a happy life.

Fair Had Large Attendance

The 34th Pennington county fair closed at Thief River Falls last Friday evening after setting what is believed to be a record for attendance. During the first four days of the exposition 45,000 people passed thru the gates. Fridny night a crowd of 15,000 were in attendance.

Haven For Hay Fever

Victims of the hay fever affliction are again flocking into northern Minnesota from all parts of the country, according to reports of state game wardens, foresters, and summer resort owners. Duluth, on the cooling shores of Lake Superior, continues to maintain its reputation of being "the hay fever capital of the nation."

Northern parts of the state "offer conditions that will bring about relief from hay fever and as a result there is an unusually large influx of tourists now from widely separated sections of our country." George H. Bradley, Director of the Minnesota State Tourist Bureau, said. "We are making a careful check and expect the number of tourist this season to far surpass that of a year ago."

Members of the Minnesota Conservation Commission have planned additional recreational opportunities for tourists and Minnesota residents in state forests and state parks through increased facilities for camping, fishing, hiking and other forms of outdoor sports.

Truck Broke Thru Bridge

A heavily loaded carnival truck broke thru the steel bridge over Lost River on highway No. 59, five miles south of Plummer Saturday morning. John Beam, Kansas City, driver of the truck, was seriously hurt and is in the hospital at Thief River Falls. The truck, one of a fleet moving the Hennies Brothers shows from the Pennington County Fair at Thief River Falls was bound for Mankato loaded with about ten ton of steel works off from rides used by the carnival.

Another Million Dollars

The rural resettlement administration, through Rexford G. Tugwell, its director, was disclosed Saturday as planning to spend close to a million dollars an a land utilization program in northern Minnesota. Tentative plans were outlined Saturday to representative R. T. Buckler of Crookston. The project will be centered in three counties, Lake of the Woods, Beltrami and Roseau. Its purpose, Buckler said, was to convert poor farming land into public forests and recreational areas and to transfer farmers from poor to fertile land.

A wedding reception was held in the Mission Church parlors Monday evening for Mr. and Mrs. Melvin Bottem. A short program was held and a sociable time enjoyed by all.

Mr. and Mrs. Bottem received many useful and beautiful gifts.

The Corn-Hog Contracts

Minnesota corn-hog contract signers who this year fail to produce, or who do not at least try to produce, at least 25 per cent of their 1932-33 base hog production, may be disqualified from receiving their 1935 hog payments, warns H. G. Bolstad, University Farm, St. Paul, state corn-hog compliance agent for Minnesota.

He urges all those who have not yet had farrowed on their farms at least 25 per cent of the number of litters they had farrowed, on the average, in 1932-33, to arrange for such farrowing as soon as possible, or be prepared to forfit their payments. Litters farrowed any time before December 1 will count toward the fulfillment of each producer's quota; he says.

With large number of piggy sows being sold every day to the packers, and with feed crop prospects in almost all parts of the state the best they have been for several year, practically every contract signer should be able to comply with this requirement, Mr. Bolstad believes.

Furthermore, he points out, since finished hogs are selling at the highest price since 1930, the opportunity to make money in hog raising is unusually good this year.

Rust Ruined Much Crop

According to statements made by some of the farmers in this community here this week, they report that they will plow under several wheat fields as they find that the black stem rust has so damaged the crop that it is not worth cutting.

Reduced Pest Population

The dry weather the past week has reduced the population of the mosquito family to a great extent. Last week we tried to give you the number of approximately how many we thot there were here of the pest but we are not yet sure whether we over or under estimated the figures.

A PROPHECY

Significant economic developments to be expected in the next decade are listed by a prominent business writer as follows: (1) Higher standard of living. (2) Continued advances in technical processes of production. (3) Factory built houses, better and cheaper than hand made houses. (4) Somewhat cheaper money. (5) Faster travel. (6) News printed by radio. (7) Mechanical cotton picker, revolutionizing the South. (8) Cheaper electric power. (9) Better distribution of goods; more chain stores. (10) Another depression five or six years hence, preceded by an inflationary boom.

TWO QUESTIONS ANSWERED

Why is it that one farmer raises 100 bushels of corn to the acre, and the other one, on the other side of the fence, raises 25 bushels to the acre? Why is it that one farmer produces 100 pounds of pork on five bushels of corn, and another uses 25 bushels? Not until power machinery, scientific principles of soil fertilization and restoration, rotation of crops, diversification of crops and economical feeding are applied to the farm, will the farmers' problem be solved, says a farm authority.

BANKING READY

NEW YORK. — There is abundant evidence that banks are in an unusually favorable position to finance a period of industrial growth, says the June issue of "Banking" published by the American Bankers Association.

An official survey on June 10 indicated that the Government of the United States, through its loans, was the potential owner of more than half of the existing world stocks of American cotton.

Visitors Praise Minnesota

Tourists from every state in the Union, from all parts of Canada, and from England, Hawaii, India and China are included in the thousands of visitors to Minnesota who have answered a post-card questionnaire prepared by the state highway department and state tourist bureau. The questionnaire is being used in connecttion with a census of tourist travel being conducted by the two departments with relief labor.

As visitors enter the state they are handed a state highway map and postcard on which the tourist may supply answens to certain travel questions if he desires.

The replies carry the highest indorsement of Minnesota as a vacation state, and in a great many cases the visitors take particular pains to praise the hospitality and courtesy shown them by Minnesota citizens, according to highway department officials.

A visitor signing himself as "Technocrat Ostling", 4007 Bagley street, Seattle, wrote: "Good highways, fine farms, good Governor. Don't monkey with a sales tax."

A. B. Crawford from Los Angeles: "Splendid roads and very beautiful scenery."

J. W. Rendall of Burke Heath, London, England: Had an excellent time. Enjoyed it all. Traffic signals in Twin Cities not very clear, though, the 'Go' and 'Stop' and the little lights being difficult to see."

Said Alice Kingsley of Roxbury, Mass.: "We all agree Minnesota is the nicest state we have been in so far."

U. S. Army Wants Men

Sergeant Chester G. Wise of the Army Recruiting Service was in town in the interest of recruiting for the Regular Army. A permanent Recruiting Station has been established in the National Guard Armory at Bemidji, Minn., with Sergeant Herman F. Hoffiman in charge.

Enlistments are open for Fort Snelling which is located between the Twin Cities of St. Paul and Minneapolis. Single men without any dependents between the ages of 18 and 35 years with at least an eighth grade school education and of good character are eligible. The Regular Army has been increased in strength and to those entering now it will offer an excellent opportunity for advancement. The Reqular Army is now composed of a high class type of men and it is desired to maintain the personnel at that high standard.

Anyone desiring further information should write, or apply in person, to the Army Recruiting Office at Bemidji, for an application blank and full details.

Sergeant Hoffman will be at the Armory in Crookston the first Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday of each month to accept any men that desire to apply from that vicinity.

New Elevator Company Here

A construction crew of several men from the Twin Cities are here this week installing a new air-dump and heavy truck scale at the Red Lake Falls Milling company elevator. They are also putting in a new man-hoist to take the place of the winding stairway going to the top of the building, as well as putting general repair on the driveways and office quarters.

Some time ago the Northern Grain and Seed Co. of Fargo, N. D., made a deal with Mrs. Markus Johnson of Minneapolis, owner of the Red Lake Falls Milling company, in which they became the owners of all the elevators she operated on this line from Crookston to Warroad. They also bought out the business of the Math Barzen Co. and have taken over all the elevators they operated along this line.

The new company have also rented the old Farmers elevator here and will use it for storing feed and seeds. Olaf T. Ness will be the manager for the new concern and will move in there and open it for business as soon as the equipment is installed and the repair work is completed.

Loven Opening New Store

Einar M. Loven who has the past eight years been employed as a clerk at the Carlson Mercantile company here, has this week resigned his position. with the company here and will move to Gatzke. Mr. Loven will join in a parenership with Melroy Aase at Gatzke and will be the manager of a new mercantile establishment they have started there.

Returned From The Lake

Mr. and Mrs. A. L. Carlson returned home Sunday from Bemidji where they had spent about five weeks at a summer home at Birchmont on Lake Bemidji. The family remained there all the time and Mr. Carlson spent the week ends and every other week there with them.

Better Have Drivers License

Beginning August 1st the State Highway Patrol will intensify its campaign against motorists who drive without a drivers license, Chief John P. Arnoldy announced recently. At the same time the Patrol will also increase its activity against bad headlights and failure of motorists to dim their headlights when meeting other cars.

"Every resident of this state must have a drivers license with him every time he operates a motor vehicle", Chief Arnoldy said. "It must be legible and should bear his correct address. I am taking this means of warning drivers throughout the state to be prepared to show their license when they meet patrol officers, and also see that their headlights and tail lights are in good condition. The Patrol will put on a number of special drives on these points beginning this week."

Big Land Purchase Approved

Heaviest purchases are in the Chippewa with 34,671 acres approved at a cost of $83,501.64. Land to be acquired in the other two units are: Superior, 19,062 acres, $47,655.47; Mesaba, 2,142 acres, $4,475.75.

Payments will be made for the lands as soon as titles are proved and physical improvement will be started as early as possible Commissioner Willard said. Civilian Conservation Corps located on or in the vicinity of the new purchases will aid in the improvement work.

Mr.-Mrs. Edwin Anderson and baby, Shirley, and Misses Beatrice and Evelyn Larson spent the week end in Ada where they enjoyed a visit with relatives and friends.

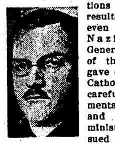
CURRENT EVENTS PASS IN REVIEW

NAZIS OF GERMANY RENEWING FIGHT ON THE CATHOLICS AND THE JEWS.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

©. Western Newspaper Union.

DETERMINATION of the Nazis to put an end to "political Catholicism" in Germany and their consequent drive against Catholic youth organizations may bring on results more serious even than has the Nazi anti-semitism. General Goering, head of the secret police, gave out a warning to Catholic priests to be careful in their comments from the pulpit, and Franz Guertner, minister of justice, issued a decree threatening prosecution for any priest violating Goering's injunction. Throughout the country generally the Catholic clergy was cautious, but in Freiburg, Baden, where the Goering order had not been published before Sunday, the priests read in their pulpits a letter from the episcopate calling the Nazi action a violation of the concordat with the Vatican. To this charge the Nazis reply that the Catholics were the first to violate the concordat by making attacks on the Hitler youth movement in their parish papers.



Franz Guertner

This new "purge" by the Nazis includes a renewed crusade against the Jews and dissolution of the Steel Helmets, veterans' organization, in various provinces. The Jews are helpless and, if Julius Streicher has his way, will be all driven out of Berlin or segregated in ghettos. But the Steel Helmets, whose chief is Minister of Labor Franz Seldte, are likely to cause the Hitler government a lot of trouble. The organization's weekly paper is using language that is not often heard in Germany these days, and Seldte is demanding the reason for suppression of the local divisions.

ANTI-CATHOLIC riots in Northern Ireland brought on fierce anti-Protestant reprisals in the Irish Free State, and it looked as if the entire island might be involved in a religious war. In Belfast a number of persons were killed by snipers, and many were injured by bombings, stone-throwings and incendiarism. At Clones the mobs destroyed a Masonic temple and set fire to a Protestant gospel hall and a recreation hall maintained by non-religious bodies. In Limerick young men ran amuck, smashing windows of buildings owned by Protestants. The Free State troops were called out but didn't seem able or willing to stop the rioting in the cities. The trouble began with the Orangemen's celebration of the Battle of the Boyne.

FARMERS in the Middle West, ready to harvest their crops, found they couldn't get hands to do the work. The idle men ordinarily counted on for this were on the relief rolls and declined offers of farm labor for two reasons: The wages paid by the farmers were less than the sums received from the relief organization or for government works, and if the men once went off the dole they feared they would have trouble getting back there when the harvest was over. The situation was desperate and emergency relief commissions were urged to take action. This they did in the states affected and it was announced the "revolt" was under control.

The Illinois commission stopped all relief works in the rural areas until after harvest. In Kansas persons refusing any temporary employment were removed from the relief rolls. In Nebraska 26 counties were cut off from federal relief allotments and in 15 others the allotments were cut in half.

In nearly a score of Iowa counties officials denied relief and able-bodied men on relief rolls were admonished to accept employment in the harvest fields.

Relief workers in Redwood county, Minnesota, shut down works projects and officials in many other counties indicated they would follow the example.

In North Dakota all but specialized projects were halted and the state administrator announced that as soon as the harvest was over the new works progress administration would take care of unemployables.

THAT wholly un-American procedure, the general strike, was tried out by organized labor in Indiana and the 67,000 inhabitants of Terre Haute were deprived of all food supplies. The local authorities of Vigo county called on the governor for help and Mr. McNutt promptly ordered 14 companies of the National Guard to the scene. Brig. Gen. Wray De Prez, in command, promised the merchants who had been bullied into shutting their shops would be given protection, and said his first endeavor would be to restore the milk and ice service. This had been cut off even from hospitals and homes with sick children.

The general strike was called by 48 unions without warning, because labor leaders had been unable to reach an agreement with the Columbian Enameling and Stamping company. Some 600 of that concern's employees went on strike in March and the plant was closed down, but the union leaders thought it was about to be reopened by strikebreakers.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT spent the week-end cruising about on the government yacht Sequoia and had as his special guest Attorney General Cummings. It was assumed with reason that one of their chief topics of discussion was the administration's recent defeats in the federal courts and the chances of getting by with the New Deal legislation lately passed or now pending. The minority in congress and such anti-administration organizations as the Liberty league were aroused to new activities and attacks on the President's policies. It was said that the proposal was made to Mr. Roosevelt that the "death sentence" in the holding companies bill be dropped for the present and carried to the country in the 1936 campaign, but that the President vetoed the idea, insisting that the measure not be permitted to die in conference. So the conferees began the task of trying to reach an agreement. Those for the senate were four to one in favor of the death sentence; those for the house, three to two against it. The facts being brought out by the two inquiries into the activities of lobbyists, of course, were expected to have some influence on the result.

Philip H. Gadsden, chairman of the committee of public utility executives, gave out an appeal for fair play. He said:

"Millions of men and women who have invested their savings in utility securities are asking the question: Are these savings to be destroyed because a few minor utility officials have resorted to scandalous and even dishonest methods in opposing the public utilities bill? Is the small utility investor to be penalized and the industry to be crippled because of isolated incidents of this kind?"

REPORTING for the eleven months that ended June 1, 1935, the AAA showed that its expenditures totaled $767,195,306. The report added that for the eleven months funds available were $918,045,145, leaving a balance on hand June 1 of $150,849,829.

Expenditures were divided as follows: Rental and benefit payments to farmers, $535,547,698; removal and conservation of surplus argricultural commodities, $10,043,550; drouth relief, food conservation and disease eradication, $145,595,764; trust fund operations $11,746,526; administrative expenses, $34,401,654, disbursement expenses, $737,005, and tax refunds, $29,123,107.

TWO to one against the New Deal was the week's score in Federal court decisions. The administration suffered severely. The Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati first held unconstitutional the condemnation of land by the PWA for slum clearance. Then the Circuit Court of Appeals in Boston dealt the AAA a terrific blow by declaring unconstitutional the processing and flour taxes. The one favorable decision was by the Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans and was that the sale of cheap electric power by the Tennessee Valley authority was constitutional.

Chester Davis

Harold Ickes, who is PWA administrator, said the slum clearance work would be carried on, though necessarily in modified form. But Chester Davis, AAA administrator, openly admitted that "the end of the processing taxes would mean the end of the Agricultural Adjustment administration in all its important aspects." He would not confess that he believed for a minute the Supreme court would confirm the ruling of the court at Boston. He asserted he had expected that decision to be adverse, saying: "That section around Boston is a hotbed of resistance to the processing taxes. Why, it's right up there among all those cotton manufacturers." This was most extraordinary comment from a high government official, but the Appeals court in Boston has not yet cited Davis for contempt.

Most well informed and unbiased persons have never believed the processing taxes would stand up under court test. The Guffey coal bill has some similar features so that those who debate it should read these paragraphs in the Boston decision:

"The power of congress to regulate interstate commerce does not authorize it to do so by taxing products either of agriculture or industry before they enter interstate commerce, or otherwise to control their production merely because their production may indirectly affect interstate commerce.

"The issue is not, as the government contended, whether congress can appropriate funds for any purpose deemed by congress in furtherance of the 'general welfare,' but whether congress has any power to control or regulate matters left to the state and lay a special tax for that purpose."

GEORGE, ex-king of Greece, was planning a sudden hop to Athens to resume the throne. Emissaries from Greece were received in the exclusive London hotel where the former monarch resides; a big airplane was kept standing in readiness at Croydon, and at another airport a second plane was prepared to carry George's servants. But the news hounds found it out and gave it to the public, whereat George was exceedingly wroth and his contemplated coup was postponed. His secretary asked newspapers and news agencies to refrain from publishing anything about his movements and reporters were not allowed to enter the hotel.

DROPPING all their rebellious indignation, the Democrats of the house did everything the administration wished in considering the social security bill as altered by the senate. The conferees had settled all differences after two weeks of hard work, but one of the amendments they accepted was that permitting private pension systems to function under the measure. The majority members of the house were informed that President Roosevelt was opposed to this, so they refused to accept it. The senate would not permit the elimination of the amendment, so back to conference went the bill.

THOMAS D. SCHALL, the blind senator from Minnesota, has been one of the sharpest tongued critics of the administration in the senate. Recently he described President Roosevelt as a "megalomaniac," and, though the word was subsequently eliminated from the Record, the Democratic senators were decidedly miffed. So a little later Senators Robinson, Black and Bone found opportunity to tell Schall what they think of him and to demand that he conform to the rules of "decency."

Senator Schall

The argument started when Schall had read by a clerk an editorial from a Texas editor, and an address of his own—all critical of the administration. Robinson protested. He asserted "when one whose moral obliquities are so great as are those of the senator from Minnesota, it becomes necessary for some one to object." He added Schall "cannot shield himself behind an unfortunate affliction."

The Schall speech said President Roosevelt was imitating Mussolini, and that Ben Cohen, an administration aid and bill drafter, had "assumed the legislative functions usurped by the Executive.

Robinson called Schall the "misrepresentative from Minnesota" and expressed the opinion the senator had "employed" some one to write his speeches.

"It is small business and only could be done by a man of small mentality," said the Arkansas senator.

Replying, Schall said, "If the people knew what was behind this government they would not stand for it a minute."

SENDING floods of telegrams to senators or representatives for or against pending legislation will not be so effective in the future, as a result of the disclosures before the senate lobby investigators. They heard evidence to the effect that large numbers of telegrams against the utilities bill were sent from Warren, Pa., by an employee of the Associated Gas and Electric system, that the messages were signed with names taken from a city directory and that the originals were destroyed at Warren.

SENATOR J. HAMILTON LEWIS of Illinois, a member of the foreign relations committee, long has urged that Great Britain be persuaded to cede to the United States her island possessions in the Caribbean sea in payment of her war debt. The other day he was moved to bring the subject up again and delivered an interesting speech in the senate. This time he based his proposal upon the "peace offer" of England to cede a portion of her territory in Somaliland to Ethiopia, which in turn would cede certain territory to Italy with a view of averting the impending war.

Senator Lewis

The senator also suggested that England surrender all rights she claims to privileges of constructing a Nicaraguan canal, recalling, as a precedent, that England compelled France to yield all claims to territory adjacent to the Suez canal.

The British islands in the West Indies, the senator said, are both useful as defense and necessary as protection for the United States. They "could be seized in time of war between nations fighting among themselves to possess the Caribbean and Southern seas. They could be used as the backyard of the United States from which supplies could be stored to be used in assault on America."

EMPEROR HAILE SELASSIE appeared before the Ethiopian parliament and made an impassioned appeal to his countrymen to fight Italy to the death, declaring he had prepared himself to die in the contest if need be.

"Ethiopia knows how to fight to preserve its independence and its sovereignty," he said.

"Soldiers! Follow the example of your warrior ancestors. Soldiers! Traders! Peasants! Young and old, men and women: Unite to face the invader! Your sovereign will be among you and will not hesitate to give his blood for the independence of his country."

Though the League of Nations council was scheduled to meet for consideration of the Italo-Ethiopian quarrel between July 25 and August 2, there were indications that the European nations were about ready to abandon Ethiopia to its fate and that if "The Lion of Judah" doesn't give in completely, Mussolini will be permitted to have his way with him. That probably will mean a long guerrilla warfare the details of which will not be pleasant reading.

Insect Cannibals Lower Crop Loss

Earworm Has Habit of Eating Its Fellows; Halts Greater Damage.

Supplied by the United States Department of Agriculture.—WNU Service.

The corn earworm's unfriendly habit of eating its fellows saves a great deal of corn that would be destroyed by these insect pests if they lived more amicably together. Out of several earworm larvae—sometimes as many as 20—entering the same ear of corn, only one may live to become an adult moth, according to recent studies by entomologists of the United States Department of Agriculture. The sole survivor of the 20 does not make away with all the others. Perhaps it kills only one or two. Its victims, however, may have accounted for one or two more, and so on. Corn earworm cannibalism is progressive.

Corn with long, tight-fitting husks is more conducive to cannibalism among earworms than corn with short, loose-fitting husks. The hungry larvae that hatch from eggs laid on corn silk outside the husk must work their way inside to the new silk and the kernels. When their only passageway is restricted—as it is when the husk covers the whole ear and extends well beyond the tip—one frequently runs upon another. No larva feeding by itself goes out of its way to pick a fight. But when it meets a fellow feeder it immediately lunges for a soft vulnerable spot of that fellow-feeder, sinks in its powerful little jaws, and voraciously devours its victim, down to the hard head capsule. In close quarters, where there is no room for a counter attack, the larva that strikes first is almost certain to win.

In open spaces, the entomologists say, all these tiny larvae lack to complete the picture of furious combat is the ability to growl, snarl, or hiss.

Weeds Are an Obstacle to Better Grade of Hay

Weeds are one of the greatest obstacles in producing high grade hay for the market, says W. H. Hosterman, hay specialist in the United States Department of Agriculture. He reports that farmers who are planning to profit from a national hay shortage—a shortage that certainly cannot be overcome in less than two or three years—will make every effort to have their hay free from weeds.

To grade as U. S. No. 1 not more than 10 per cent of foreign material—which is usually made up of weeds—may be present in hay. For Nos. 2 and 3 the tolerance is 15 and 20 per cent, respectively, except for alfalfa where the allowance is 5, 10, and 15 per cent. Alfalfa, says Mr. Hosterman, usually is "very clean," which accounts for the difference in grade requirements.

Weeds are particularly bothersome in the annual hays such as soy beans, Sudan grass, and lespedeza.

The most bothersome weed reported in soy bean hay is the prickly spurge nettle (bull nettle). With the slightest dampness—even the breath of animals eating it—an offensive odor arises. Seed of the nettle also is objectionable when soy beans are harvested as a seed crop.

Pine-Fed Pigs

In the Middle ages millions of porkers picked up a precarious living in the great forests, grubbing for acorns and roots. Today they are regaled on quick-fattening oil cake, which makes better bacon. But such fare is dear, and Germans have been enjoined to observe economy in pig-feeding. Now, says the Tit-Bit Magazine, a German chemist has come to their aid with an extract from pinewood, of which commodity Germany has millions of acres. It is claimed that this extract is capable of fattening pigs rapidly and satisfactorily.

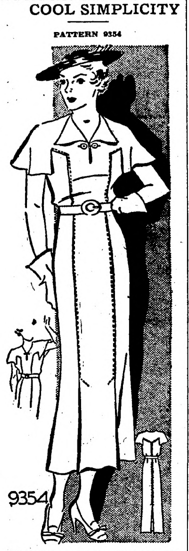
WITH AN EYE TO COOL SIMPLICITY

PATTERN 9354



The smart girl has one eye on the budget and the other anticipating a rise in temperature—and makes a cool decision to include several summer sports in her wardrobe right now. It took a lot of ingenuity to design that clever yoke-cape-panel in one. It makes sewing so easy, and briefly, that cape is much cooler than a sleeve. Pattern 9354 sports an action pleat back and skirt just to help you "get places." If you find a simple flat neckline becoming, omit the dashing revers (but we like 'em). Very correct for spectator sports, office wear or week-end jaunts. Make it up in washable sport silk or shantung. Try a novel "cork" buckle and buttons.

Pattern 9354 may be ordered only in sizes 14, 16, 18, 20, 32, 34, 36, 38, 40 and 42. Size 16 requires 4 yards 36 inch fabric.

Send FIFTEEN CENTS in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for this pattern. Be sure to write plainly your NAME, ADDRESS, the STYLE NUMBER and SIZE.

Complete, diagrammed sew chart included.

Send your order to Sewing Circle Pattern Department, 232 West Eighteenth Street, New York.

SYNOPSIS

Following his father's bitter criticism of his idle life, and the withdrawal of financial assistance, Hal Ireland, only son of a wealthy banker, finds himself practically without funds but with the promise of a situation in San Francisco, which city he must reach, from New York, within a definite time limit. He takes passage with a cross-country auto party on a "share expense" basis. With five other members of the party, an attractive girl, Barry Trafford; middle-aged Giles Kerrigan; Sister Anastasia, a nun; and an individual whom he instinctively dislikes, Martin Crack, he starts his journey. Barry's reticence, and her self-withdrawal, annoy him. To Kerrigan he takes at once.

Gradually Mrs. Pulsipher began to prattle about the household of her married daughter in Bridgeport, about places she and John had seen this trip and how they had liked them, about the reasons for sending certain postcards to certain friends back in L. A. Sister Anastasia maintained her sweet, receptive silence all the while; and Barry barely punctuated Mrs. Pulsipher's devious sequences with a soft, almost-husky "Yes" or "Did you?" or "No, I've never been there." Each time Hal looked at her in the mirror he felt she knew that he was looking; though she never glanced at him, her eyes seemed to go slowly on their conscious guard.

Kerrigan asked appropriate questions, as if he were edified by all that Mrs. Pulsipher had to say; and in a tone of anxiety and hope John from time to time stammered footnotes to his lady's saga of travel and domesticity.

Hal had forgotten about the dog until it gave a quick whimper, and Barry an exclamation that made him look around. The dog's forelegs were in Sister Anastasia's lap, his head turned in reproach toward where Barry brushed a shower of little embers from the coat upon which he had been lying.

"Oh, the lining," Mrs. Pulsipher half wailed in sorrow. "Oh, is it ruined?" Then, with a grim pounce of her words at Hal: "His cigarette blew in the other window. Oh, what a shame, what a—"

"I am most awfully sorry," said Hal, sincerely contrite before the girl's disinterested look.

"The lining's ruined," said Mrs. Pulsipher with finality and triumph. "Ruined."

Barry's eyes—solemn, impersonal, confidently clear of resentment—looked down at the burn again. "It's not bad," she said to Mrs. Pulsipher. "It's easily patched. Really." She leaned to look beyond her knees. "Do you s'pose the rest of it's on the floor?"

Hal saw a coal glowing on the carpet and found enough cigarette behind it to pick up. The end was wet, brown, and flattened; he threw it quickly out. Barry's blue look—the blue of asters, flecked with small, clear crystals of live yellow—accused him of something then. "That wasn't your cigarette," she said.

Hal smiled a little. "It hardly matters," he said. "I'm so awfully sorry about—it."

"Please don't think of it," said Barry. "It's really nothing."

"You're being a sportsman."

"No," she said quietly, and her full lips came together again in composed defense, her eyes saying briefly, No, you don't; not that way.

Something made him stop his look on Crack as he turned back. Crack sat there as if the straight, sparsely padded seat were the top of comfort, as if the close, damp heat under the sun-baked roof were the first beguilement of a spring sun. A slight, confident smile held his lazy lips—lips that had a smooth curve of adolescence without being precisely youthful either. Hal watched him longer than he meant to, interested by something he couldn't see with his eyes. Crack's amiable smile broadened a little before he turned his head slowly, and Hal didn't look away until Crack's full face was toward him. What's the little guy thinking now? Hal wondered.

* * * * * * *

In the flimsily converted room where dark screens sealed in heat, flies, and the smell of frying hamburger and onions, two heavy and hot sisters clumped about on quick feet—cooking, waiting, finding things miraculously without collision. Miller put a toothpick into his grinning mouth and leaned sleepily on the counter. "Say," he said, as if he were a policeman, "is it a good garridge in this burg?"

"Is there something wrong with the car?" said Mrs. Pulsipher at once.

Miller cocked the toothpick at her. "Yup," he said. "Couple stickin' valves. Might's well get 'em fixed up while you folks eat."

"Gad, sir, why didn't you get 'em fixed yesterday?" Kerrigan asked.

"Sleepin' yestiddy," said Miller and sucked sharply. "Come in from Chicago in thirty hours."

"Look here, speedball," said Kerrigan gravely, "we've been delayed enough already. If you crowded the heap this far, you can get through till supper time. We can sleep where we eat tonight and you'll have a lot more time than here."

Mrs. Pulsipher, nodding decisive approval, said: "Yes."

Miller looked sheepish. "Awright—sure," he said; "but I gotta get gas noil." "There's a pump outside," said one fat sister. Miller looked round at the window with slow suspicion. "Awright," he said.

The others moved upon the tables at the back of the room with apparent intent to have a meal. Hal stayed at the counter, moodily regarding the fly-specked thermometer that stood at eighty-nine. He heard Mrs. Pulsipher saying confidentially, ". . . and lots of onions over it, crisp. I'll tell you about my dessert later." "Bring some ham neggs," Miller said, as if life were too short and weary a thing to permit exercise of imagination. Hal ordered oatmeal cookies at three for a nickel from under a glass bell, and a bottle of oversharp but icy ginger ale.

Then Crack came to the counter from nowhere in particular, and in his unsurely pitched voice told the girl, "I'll have the same as him."

Hal looked at him and found him smiling reticently, his eyes bemused and faintly speculative.

He wondered how much Barry had ordered.

"She's the only one isn't eating enough for a hired hand," said Crack. "Her and that frog sister."

Hal looked at him quickly, but there was nothing definable in the indolent amiability of Crack's light-blue eyes.

"Who d'you mean by 'her'?" said Hal inhospitably —adding to himself, If this guy goes on reading my mind, I'll give it to him as a present; I won't live with it.

"The babe they thought was with me—Trafford," said Crack.

Hal finished his ginger ale in a sting-y, refreshing gulp and put a dime on the counter. Then he turned for a look of frank curiosity at the faintly rosy, unaged face beside him. Even if the fella's standards were totally different from his own, what did it matter if Hal was rude to him? The lazy, mischievous curiosity of his eyes seemed to be partly ready for rebuffs. Hal nodded briefly and went out into the hazed, dust-smelling sunlight that was just as hot and caged-in as the screened room.

He went around the corner into what was technically shade and leaned against the wall to light a cigarette.

The terrier, unleashed, trotted around the corner eager for smells, and then the Trafford girl came, watching him with a thoughtful smile, the conscious defense of her large eyes gratefully relaxed. The h—l with being a stick, Hal said to himself; one honest try, and if she turns it back at me, I can jolly-well be rude with comfort.

He watched her take a couple of her sure, deliberate steps. Her smile took away the traces of toughness Hal thought he'd noticed before—accented a smooth delicacy in the slight in-drawing of her cheeks under the high cheek bones. The faint pink there wasn't make-up either; and her frank lips wore no lipstick. They were frank lips, generous, full without being sensual, under their two simple peaks. There was an air about her of reticent vitality, sure and artless as the angle which gave her plain blue hat its chic.

Hal pushed his back from the wall and spoke a quiet "Hello."

Her look at him was startled, almost alarmed, but he met her eyes aggressively, smiling. It was an instant before her smile began, the parting of her lips delayed; her look was relieved, but without demonstration. "Hello," she said, as if to a pleasant little boy, and looked off to see where the dog was.

"How're you?" he said.

"Fine," she said, her smooth voice just off huskiness. She appraised his smiling eyes thoughtfully another moment before she added, "Your clothes are English."

"They're my brother's," he said at once, wondering why the devil he'd said that when it was his own old suit and he had no brother anyway.

"You like England," she said, not as if he would deny it but as if he wouldn't volunteer it. "You probably went to college there once."

"Yes," said Hal. "Why not?"

"You like it better than this country."

"I'm not sure I'd say that."

"You're not sure you wouldn't, either, are you? Are you flattered when people take you for an Englishman?"

"Used to be, when I was younger. Why?"

"How old are you now?"

"Twenty-six." Hal's eyes were laughing as he said to himself, Holy mackerel, what is this? Look to your balance here, Ireland. "How old are you?"

"About twenty-three," she said, as if it were quite unimportant.

"You mean about twenty-three by count, but far older in—in experience." He kept the brightness in his eyes, his smile widening.

That seemed to please her; she gave a single laugh and looked down at his mouth, then back at his eyes and off to see where the dog was. But she said nothing.

"What's the pup's name?" he said.

"Doctor Caligari," she said, and the dog looked around from an abandoned oil drum in bright inquiry.

"Which part do you call him?"

"Doc," she said. "I don't suppose you ever saw that German movie a long time ago—'The Cabinet of Doctor Caligari'?"

"Three times," he said. "One of the five best pictures I ever saw."

They both watched the dog for a moment of silence; it wasn't until afterward that Hal realized they must both have been thinking hard, that they shouldn't have been watching him.

Then portly Kerrigan ambled around the corner, the smoke wisp from the cigarette in his wide mouth drifting up past one squinted eye. He sucked a damp breath between his lips and his closed teeth as he looked at Hal. "You a federal man?"

Hal chuckled in his surprise and searched Kerrigan's face for a hint of humor. "No," he said; "are you?"

"No," said Kerrigan. "I've tried a few things in a short life, but never had time for that."

Hal bent over and snapped his fingers at Doc. The dog came at once hopped his forefeet up on Hal's knee, and tried to repay Hal's deft massaging with licks at his nose.

"Sounded off at that fella Crack in New York, didn't he?" Kerrigan was saying.

Hal looked up and found Barry's eyes on him, solemn again and faintly hostile. "Yes," she said. Then, "Here, Doc." She snapped the lead to his collar, gave Kerrigan a friendly smile and said, "I think I'll sit in the car."

They watched her walk away, her arms swinging to the unstudied, inquiring grace of her long-legged steps. Kerrigan's brown eyes were pleased to themselves, almost genial, as he looked at Hal. "Hollywood, I guess," he said, in odd gentleness.

"Shouldn't wonder," said Hal.

"Got everything," Kerrigan said, with a sort of wistful benevolence. "Ought to make the number-one spot if she screens like her looks."

"And if Miller doesn't kill us all," said Hal.

Kerrigan sucked a wet breath through narrowly parted lips. "He seems to lead easily in his sleep. I guess he's all right. Anything't happens comes under the head of experience anyway, and that's profit."

"I suppose so."

The twinkle was more personal as Kerrigan watched him with amusement and care. "Only suppose?" he said.

Hal smiled. "Well, I haven't had such a h—l of a lot—really."

"If fifty years can say anything to you," said Kerrigan kindly, unurgently, "I recommend the collecting of experience. Cigar bands, postage stamps, porcelains, even dollars aren't in it." He stopped before Hal expected him to.

"You have a collection?"

"Decent," said Kerrigan without arrogance. "Decent enough. Some have escaped me because I've looked too hard for 'em; there're a couple of holes I'd like to fill."

"Such as," said Hal.

"It's probably different with different collectors," Kerrigan said with a polite semblance of caution. "Most people would think the hole in mine was a little on the seamy side, perhaps." He looked at Hal in detached honesty. "I've never been alone with a man—a man who deserved to be killed—and killed him."

Hal searched for some trace of madness in the brown, wise look, but he could see none. He laughed shortly.

"I'll remember that," he said, "and let you know if anything turns up."

Kerrigan's eyes smiled in appreciative warmth, and Hal let his own answer them with an involuntary addition to civility.

The after-lunch leg of the journey lay through more hopeful country. There were strata of good smells—smell of new hay, of flowers, of the fertile, country richness about cow-barns.

Barry's eyes, in the mirror, were deep with their blue thoughtfulness, far away from the car now, oblivious of its passengers and of Hal's studies of her smooth-featured solemnity. Once or twice she looked in Crack's direction, as if wondering what he might be like; but not Hal's straight, limber back before her nor his quick, gray eyes in the mirror, caught her curiosity at all.

Then in the silence, watching the endless concrete run in from the contours and white-posted curves ahead, Hal came slowly by an illusion of some presence riding with them in the car—something that had been there all along but was perceptible only now that the first stiff fringes of strangeness had been talked away, were being dozed away. It seemed faintly—very faintly, when Hal tried to fix it and examine it—portentous, like thunder muttering in the next valley after a sultry day.

The man's driving is getting me, Hal thought: at my time of life, too. Or is it because the low hour of the day's coming, without signs of a bath or clean clothes or whisky and soda?

Hal was honestly trying to marshal some innocent and friendly remark to draw Barry from her isolation—and scare off his own faint uneasiness—when somewhere down on the floor the impetuous rattle of a smothered alarm clock hurried up into the silence. Doc sprang up, barking, and Mrs. Pulsipher dove forward with a scared grunt, as if for the start of a shoe-tying contest. Burrowing with grim diligence into her black, near-leather hold-all, she brought up the alarm clock and stopped it just before it could trail wearily off of itself.

"Why did you wind it again, John?" she said all in a breath, her face red, her eyes angry as if she had been lucky to escape with a mere fright.

John was terribly embarrassed. "I—I—I—I don't know," he said. "I—I—I don't know."

In the mirror, Hal watched Barry's look at John's bewilderment—an indulgent look, with a hint of amused tenderness, as if John were another dog who might be friends with Doctor Caligari. Then her reflected look met his. The tenderness went from it, her eyes barely remembered him, shared nothing with him, remained on him for only a second of half-hostile disinterest before they returned to the moving roadside.

In 1928 Japan made its first shipment of frozen tuna to the United States. Since then the industry has grown until as much as 6,000 tons a year are exported to the United States.

Natural That Children Should "Want to Know"

By MRS. NESTOR NOWELL,
National Kindergarten Association,
New York City.

The normal child is always asking questions unless he has been snubbed, time after time, for asking them. He comes into a wonderful world. Everything about him is new. Naturally he wants to know what is happening and why. He wants to "see the wheels go round."

"Bobby is always asking questions," says a tired mother. Perhaps if she were to take time to answer a few he would not bother her so much. As a rule, a child will ask a question until he gets an answer. Why should we not make up our minds to this from the start?

I should be alarmed if a child ceased to have an interest in all things around him. A normal, healthy child is bristling with questions. It is by asking them that he grows in understanding. No parent should discourage the question habit.

Of course you should let your child think out certain things for himself, but you must answer some of the questions which lead him toward the solution of his problem.

I cannot remember the time when I did not answer my little girl's questions. A girl can ask as many as a boy. Some of them were real puzzlers. I had to look up the answers in books. I did not pretend to be a goddess, knowing everything. I often said, "I think we shall find the answer to this question in one of our big books," meaning the dictionary or some volume of the encyclopedia.

Mothers must answer questions. It does not hurt any of us to search for the answers, and so continue our education. I consider we can still learn much. We can learn as long as we live.

Children may ask questions at inopportune moments. Generally they do! Then the mother, irritated, often says, "Don't bother me." I used to make it a point, when I could not answer at once, to say, "I will tell you at—" naming the time. I always kept my word. The intelligent child will remind the mother of her promise. She will say, as did my little girl, "Mother, is this the time to answer those questions I asked this morning?" One of us was pretty sure to remember it.

I generally wrote down my daughter's question, if I knew I should need a book to answer it. You will find that a child whose questions are answered thoughtfully at some definite time which the mother may choose will not overwhelm her with too many at once, because she will concentrate on the two or three, the answers to which have been promised.

I do not think it fair for a mother to ignore or to refuse to answer her child's questions. The father is generally away much of the time. The mother is nearly always near the young child, therefore it is she who must reply to questions, to the best of her ability. There are so many wonderful books for mothers nowadays that there is little excuse for not doing so. When one does not answer, perhaps it is sheer laziness. At any rate, a likely result will be that later on, when serious matters come to the child's mind, other persons instead of mother will be questioned, and how surprised and distressed that mother will be when she learns about it.

About Food

WARM weather plays pranks with appetites. Haven't you known your well-regulated family who like the things they are supposed to like, and enjoy their meals nine months in the year, to suddenly go berserk about food, when the temperature rises?

For this malady dietitians prescribe an entire change of menus, and a distinct brightening up of the table. If your table linens have been white or pastel shades all winter, use some of the new dark linens. Change everything.

And above all things change your menus. Serve colorful foods. Do you know the infinite possibilities of change of color and flavor by using tomatoes plentifully on your menus? Their healthful properties will pep up jaded appetites, and suddenly your whole dinner will appear appetizing—no matter what the thermometer says.

Proof of the Pudding

Tomato Ring with Persian Melon Balls: Strain the contents of one No. 2 can of tomatoes, add one-half teaspoon salt, one teaspoon sugar and bring to boiling. Soak five teaspoons gelatin in four tablespoons cold water and dissolve in the hot tomato juice. Cool and chill. When about ready to set, add one-half cup of mayonnaise, pour into a wet ring mold and set in the refrigerator to stiffen. Meanwhile cut a Persian melon in small balls and marinate in French dressing. When ready to serve, turn the tomato ring out onto a round platter and fill the center with melon balls. Around the ring place small hearts of lettuce filled with mayonnaise. This serves eight persons.

Steak Casserole: Cut one pound slice of round steak in four servings, salt and pepper each piece and roll in flour. Brown the meat in drippings, then lay them in a casserole and slice over the top one onion, one carrot and one-half of a green pepper. Pour over the contents of one can of tomato soup and two tablespoons water. Cover and bake in a slow oven—350 degrees—for one and one-half hours or until the meat is tender. This serves four persons.*

Safetygrams
BY FRED W. BRAUN
© The Safety Man

Everybody has the right to use public streets and roads, but we are all expected to use them in the same manner. People who do not stop to think of safety are largely to blame for making streets dangerous.

It should hardly be necessary for this column to again tell people how to cross streets.

The right place to cross a street is at an intersection - - not in the middle of the block. An automobile driver does not expect to meet people walking across a street between intersections. Neither does an automobile driver expect people to jemp out from behind parked cars or other objects. This puts the automobile driver ot a distinct disadvantage and it usually ends disastrously for the pedestrian.

Do not be a jay walker. Cross streets at intersectios and you will live longer.

County Auditor Arrested

Harry L. Fowler, Pennington county auditor who was elected president of the Minnesota County Auditors association last January, today is out on $3,000 bond in connection with embezzlement of more than $13,000 of county funds.

Fowler, about 45 years old, was arrested Sunday on a warrant specifically charging unlawful issuance of a county warrant for $1,487.50, but a report received by County Attorney H. O. Berve from Edward J. Pearlove, state comptroller, cites misappropriation of $13,755.79. The alleged peculations cover a four-year period.

The county auditor, married and father of five children, came to Thief River Falls from Baudette about five year ago.

Fowler disappeared from his home June 25 and, according to the county attorney, went to California. County officials a few days ago received word he would return to face the charges and he was taken in custody at his home when he appeared.

Comptroller Pearlove's report, released to the county attorney, reveals shortages of: $8,499.65 in attached rents on delinquent property; $3,419.02 realized from tax certificates; $1,487.50 covering a duplicate warrant, and $349.62 interest on the warrant.

GREAT EXHIBITS AT STATE FAIR

All The Latest Developments In Agriculture, Industry and Home to be Presented.

The Minnesota State Fair—America's wonder exposition of 1935—will present in its educational exhibits a complete cross-section of the latest developments in agriculture, industry and the home.

Thousands of individual displays and demonstrations during the exposition, August 31 to September 7, will show the producer the types and varieties of agricultural products and livestock best adapted for practical and profitable development. Likewise the exhibits will acquaint the housewife and consumer with economical additions to the farm and home. Increased emphasis also will be placed upon consumption as an aid to enlarged and expanded markets.

$75,000 in Premiums

Competitive exhibits in all classes and divisions will share in the $75,000 in premiums being offered by the management. Bountiful harvests and improved agricultural conditions assure the cream of the farm produce and livestock.

The elite of the livestock world—6,000 of the nation's finest—will compete for ribbons and trophies emblematic of the American championships. Prime examples of the best in breeding and feeding will point the way to improved and more profitable livestock farming.

Moving machinery—30 acres of it—will present a complete clinic of scientific and practical developments in farm equipment and home aids.

Reaching a pinnacle of youthful achievement, the 4-H club displays and demonstrations will be larger, more comprehensive than ever. Year by year the management has increased this activity until 2,000 boys and girls will participate in a multitude of projects and exhibits.

New Junior Exhibits

A new junior division in the Woman's Activities department will permit girls not enrolled in Club work to participate in open competition.

The housewife and home - maker will find a wide field of interest at the Fair. The finest examples of exquisite handicraft will be assembled in the Woman's Activities building. Visual exhibits will present up-to-the minute ideas in child welfare, infant care, problems of adolescent children and a host of other subjects of vital importance to the housewife and mother.

Displays of domestic and foreign foods will be included in the State Fair food show, an innovation this year.

In the household equipment division hundreds of new labor saving devices for the farm and home will be demonstrated.

New classifications in the horticultural division will offer only those fruits, flowers and garden crops best adapted specificially for production in Minnesota.

Minnesota's pre-eminence as a butter-producing state will be reflected in the attractive displays of butter and cheese exhibits.

Once again admission will be only 25 cents.

The farmers have now wound up most of the haying and are at the work of harvesting their crops. The recent wind storms have flatened down the grain in such a way that it makes a hard job of cutting the fields this year.

Miss Amanda Fosholm returned home Tuesday from a weeks vacation spent traveling thru the lake region in Minnesota. She accompanied Mr. and Mrs. Carl B. Larson and daughter of Thief River Falls.

Mr. and Mrs. Halvor Brunsvold of Hanlantown, Iowa spent the week here visiting with friends and relatives. They were accompanied by a daughter-in-law of Mr. Brunsvold.

Repaired Elevator Here

The construction crew that were here from Minneapolis to repair and install new equipment at the Northern Seed and Grain company elevator, finished up their work on Tuesday and left for Euclid, Minn. to work on an elevator there and also spend a couple of days at Luna Siding south of Warren. The Goldberg Bros. owners of the elevator company here have eighteen houses in this part of the state and are having them all put in first class shape for taking in grain this fall.

Visitors From Milwaukee

Mrs. Clyde Williams and sons, Mrs. Norman Jacobson and Mrs. Knute Brown of Milwaukee and Mr. and Mrs. Jake Brown and son of Warren visited with Mrs. R. Nyhus and other friends on Tuesday. Mrs. Brown and daughters are former residents of Holt.

Here are six prominent rules to follow on your camping trips:

Be sure your match is out. Break it in two before you throw it away.

Be sure that pipe ashes and cigar or cigarette stubs are dead before throwing them away. Never throw them into brush, leaves or needles.

Before building a fire scrape away all flamable material from a spot five feet in diameter.

Never break camp until your fire is out - - dead out.

Never burn slash or brush in windy weather.

Stir the coals while soaking them with water. Turn small sticks and drench both sides. Wet the ground around the fire. Be sure the last spark is dead.

These recommendatiohs are made by the American Forestry Association, and we should be sure that they are observed at all times so that our forests will not burn.

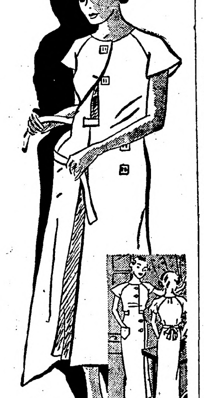
Versatility Here, and Also Comfort

Pattern 2240



No one has ever designed anything to equal the chic and comfort of the "Wrap-around" for efficient performance of household duties. And in our crowded lives today, Efficiency plays an important part. Perhaps that's why a house frock that could "go to market" to prove its versatility has been conceived. Don't those big square buttons conform beautifully with the unique cut of the front?—and joys of joys, the wrap is deep enough to keep from popping out at the wrong time. Confidentially, freedom isn't the only virtue of those sleeves—they're so easy to make.

Pattern 2240 is available in sizes 14, 16, 18, 20, 32, 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44. Size 16 takes 4 yards 36 inch fabric. Illustrated step-by-step sewing instructions included.

Send FIFTEEN CENTS (15c) in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for this pattern. Write plainly name, address and style number. BE SURE TO STATE SIZE.

Address orders to Sewing Circle Pattern Department 243 West Seventeenth street, New York.

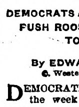
CURRENT EVENTS PASS IN REVIEW

DEMOCRATS ARE DETERMINED TO PUSH ROOSEVELT TAX PLAN TO PASSAGE.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© Western Newspaper Union.

DEMOCRATIC congressmen started the week briskly determined to push through the President's "soak the rich" tax bill at this session. Opposing them with equal determination were a number of the hardest fighting Republicans who insist that consideration of taxation be postponed until next winter and that meantime the question be studied carefully in connection with the budget for the next fiscal year. These Republicans are urgently calling for an early adjournment of congress. Senator Hastings of Delaware has introduced a resolution setting August 10 as the day for quitting and was trying to have it brought up for consideration before passage of the tax measure. Senator Vandenberg of Michigan, often mentioned as a Presidential possibility, also demanded postponement of the tax legislation until January, and he gave out a statement denouncing the administration's plan as a "sterile political gesture" which would raise "only a little extra pocket change" and declared that "we chatter of taxes in millions to offset known deficits in billions."



Senator Vandenberg

"The pending tax bill, as it is being developed," said Senator Vandenberg, "will not produce appreciable revenue for Uncle Sam. It will not pay the President's deficit even for the period while the bill is under consideration. As a contribution to the public credit, it is as grim a hoax as was ever perpetrated on the country. As a 'distributor of wealth' it is a mere vagrant flirtation with this left wing idea."

Nevertheless, it appeared probable that the tax measure would be enacted before adjournment, for the administration leaders had promised this to Senator La Follette and other "liberals," and besides that, they have no desire to pass a taxation bill in a Presidential election year. As produced by the house ways and means committee after great travail the measure embodies an 87 per cent confiscation of large fortunes and increased levies on the rich which would produce perhaps $250,000,000 of additional annual revenue.

NEEDY teachers and students are to get financial help from the Works Progress administration according to plans being perfected by Dr. L. R. Alderman. The two chief points in his program are:

Establishment of summer schools for 1,200 teachers who were among those who taught reading and writing to 500,000 illiterates last year.

Jobs to be provided for 125,000 college students during the coming school year.

Twenty-five summer schools will be conducted, the sessions lasting six weeks, and the teachers attending them will be paid from $15 to $18 a week out of the work relief funds. These teachers will be taught to teach adults in the fall.

Alderman said he already had sent out field agents to aid in setting up courses at New York university, Ohio State university, Purdue university, Olivet college (Michigan), University of Wisconsin, University of Chicago and University of California. The other training schools have not been selected.

ALONG the line of providing help for white collar workers, Harry L. Hopkins appointed four technical assistants to direct the employment of painters, musicians, writers and actors. They are: Nikolai Sokoloff for music, Hallie Flanagan for the theater, Holger Cahill for painters and sculptors, and Henry G. Alseberg for writers.

With $300,000,000 available for the estimated 750,000 white collar people on relief, scores of surveys, censuses, traffic studies, and similar projects have been provided for those with no particular skill.

Some scholars will get jobs from the $20,000,000 worth of white collar projects already approved for New York city, but other projects have awaited appointment of the four directors.

Hopkins also announced that camps for unemployed women, initiated last year, would be revived this summer, with a suggested term of from six weeks to two months. State relief administrations will be in charge. Educational programs will be offered, but all but three of the camp staff must come from relief rolls themselves.

OPPONENTS of the AAA amendments designed to strengthen the powers of Secretary of Agriculture Wallace decided to let the basic act go up to the Supreme court, so the administration bill was passed by the senate with only 15 adverse votes.

Both Republican and conservative Democratic foes of the AAA are confident that the Supreme court will hold the basic act unconstitutional and an early test is assured by a senate amendment permitting suits to recover processing taxes that have not been passed on to producers or consumers. One of the major purposes of the amendments was to close the courts, but the senate rejected this scheme by a vote of 41 to 23. As a result, the Hoosack Mills case, in which the Boston Circuit Court of Appeals held the AAA unconstitutional, will not be thrown out and the highest tribunal will have a chance to pass upon it.

SENATOR GLASS scored perhaps the greatest victory in his long public career when the senate, without a record vote, passed his draft of the 1935 banking act, rejecting the central bank features urged by Gov. Marriner S. Eccles of the federal reserve board and favored by the administration. The doughty Virginian, who was once secretary of the treasury, had fought desperately against the Eccles scheme and his triumph was decisive. There was no demand for a roll call on the final vote, for the fate met by the proposers of various amendments showed this procedure would be futile. Senator La Follette sought to strike out a provision permitting commercial banks to underwrite securities and his proposal was beaten, 39 to 22. Senator Gerald Nye of North Dakota, another radical Republican, offered the central bank plan of Rev. Charles E. Coughlin, radio priest, which would set up a government owned and wholly dominated system. It was voted down, 59 to 10.

Senator Glass

Other amendments were offered and debated rather listlessly, for the record, and then were withdrawn. Even Senator Duncan U. Fletcher of Florida, chairman of the banking and currency committee, who had sided rather with Eccles, declined to push his amendments designed to cripple Glass' plan.

The senate bill was sent to conference, for the house passed the measure drawn up on the advice of Eccles and Tugwell.

PARTIAL investigation of the milk industry by the federal trade commission was said to have revealed deplorable conditions and the administration asked for $200,000 to continue the inquiry. The senate committee in considering the deficiency appropriation bill cut out that item altogether, but when the measure came before the senate Duffy of Wisconsin moved an amendment adding the sum asked. After a hot debate this was approved by a vote of 51 to 18 and the bill was then passed. The numerous senate amendments had added a total of more than $80,000,000 to the house measure, so the $306,000,000 bill was sent to conference.

WHAT was in the cigar box wrapped in a newspaper? That is what Senator Hugo Black, chairman of the senate lobby committee, wanted to know. Before the committee for questioning was John W. Carpenter of Dallas, president of the Texas Power and Light company. He admitted freely that he and other utility men had hotel conferences, dinners and a trip down Chesapeake bay with congressmen during the fight over the Wheeler-Rayburn bill, and that he himself had centered his efforts on Texas congressmen. But of the mysterious box he could or would tell nothing. Black probed and probed, and finally asked:

Senator Black

"Do you still say that in the morning (of the day before the vote on the utilities bill 'death sentence') you didn't give a congressman a box wrapped up in a newspaper?"

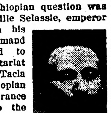
Carpenter replied quietly: "I don't think I did, unless it was a few cigars."

Senate and house conferees met to consider the utility control bill, but there were small signs that they could get together, and one session ended abruptly in a real row. Two administration lobbyists, Benjamin Cohen and Dozier A. De Vane, were brought into the executive session by Senators Wheeler and Barkley and though Representative George Huddleston protested, their continued presence was insisted upon.. Whereupon the fiery Alabama congressman and his fellows from the house walked out and broke up the meeting. Cohen is generally given credit for writing the measure and Wheeelr has said he knows all about it.

After leaving the committee room, Huddleston said flatly that the house conferees would not recede from the position that the "death sentence" must be eliminated.

GRAY SILVER, who throughout most of his life was active in the interests of agriculture, died quite suddenly at his home in Martinsburg, W. Va., at the age of sixty-five years. Among the offices he held at various times were president of the United States Grain Market corporation of Chicago; president of the Inwood Fruit Growers' co-operative corporation; president Berkeley Fruit Growers; head of the Easters' Credit association; director United Growers of America, head of the Federated Growers Credit association; member of the National Bureau of Economic Research, member of the commission appointed by President Taft to study tariff relations to the wool industry, member of the farm bureau federation visiting Europe in 1924, and a member of the commission investigating national unemployment.

IMMEDIATE convocation of the League of Nations council to deal with the Italo-Ethiopian question was demanded by Haile Selassie, emperor of Etpiopia. On his behalf the demand was telegraphed to the league secretariat at Geneva by Tacla Hawariat, Ethiopian minister to France and delegate to the league. He insisted that the council proceed to the examination of the situation under article XV of the league covenant, Ethiopia invoking this article because of the "threat to her independence from Italy."



Emperor Haile Selassie

British dispatches said Prime Minister Stanley Baldwin and leading members of his cabinet were believed to favor full league action, if other nations agreed, as a last resort to avert the threatened conflict. Diplomatic quarters in London heard that the British government probably would alter its policy and permit the export of arms to Ethiopia. The emperor's new minister there, W. C. Martin, had a conference at the foreign office and came out smiling happily but saying nothing.

Previously Mr. Martin had admitted that Ethiopia was short not only of arms but also of money.

MOST people believe that concerted action by Communists anywhere is directed from Moscow. There is good reason for the belief in the case of the riotous attack on the German Lloyd liner Bremen as she lay at her dock in New York. The reds, numbering about 2,000, forced their way on board the vessel, tore the German Nazi flag from the bow and tossed it into the Hudson river, after which they fought a lively battle with the police and the crew. The government in Washington forestalled any diplomatic protest from Berlin, expressing regret for the incident through Assistant Secretary of State Wilbur J. Carr. A New York organization calling itself the Anti-Nazi federation was said to be planning further demonstrations against German boats.

President William Green of the American Federation of Labor entered the situation by calling on the federal government to take action against the Hitler government to stop the "brutal, inhuman treatment" of the laboring class.

ACCORDING to the Daily Herald of London, the British admiralty intends to build an entire new battle fleet, to be finished by 1942 and to cost $750,000,000. This laborite newspaper asserted that the admiralty has developed a secret seven-year plan, calling for the construction of 12 new capital ships and 33 new cruisers. In addition, there would be 63 new flotilla leader destroyers, 21 new submarines and three new aircraft carriers.

This is said to be the "hush-hush plan" of the admiralty which Sir Bolton Eyres-Monsell, first lord of the admiralty, had declined to make public but which had already been communicated to the United States, France, Italy, Germany and Japan. Sir Bolton recently informed the house of commons that England was abandoning the principle of naval ratios in the Washington treaty, considering other means of accomplishing naval limitation under a system of programs providing adequate defensive navies.

Under the reported program, the comparative strength of the British fleet in "in date" ships as of 1935 and 1942, allowing for ships which would become outdated under the Washington and London treaty rules, would be:

In 1935, 15 capital ships, 50 cruisers, 84 flotilla leader-destroyers, 39 submarines, eight aircraft carriers; in 1942, 14 capital ships, 72 cruisers, 142 flotilla-leader destroyers, 57 submarines and 10 aircraft carriers.

THAT row over the administration of the Virgin islands was so unpleasant that President Roosevelt felt impelled to settle it himself. So he removed from office the two chief battlers, Gov. Paul M. Pearson and Judge T. Webber Wilson, had other jobs found for them, and nominated as Pearson's successor Lawrence W. Cramer, who was serving as lieutenant governor of St. Croix island. Confirmation of this appointment was not immediate. The senate committee investigating the islands affairs was slow in making up its mind about Cramer, and from St. Thomas came the news that the foes of the Pearson administration there, together with a delegation from St. Croix, were protesting vigorously against the President's selection of a new governor.

The disposal of Pearson and Wilson also aroused criticism in Washington. The former had been attacked steadily by Pat Harrison of Mississippi and other Democratic senators, but Secretary of the Interior Ickes had defended him warmly, so he was given a job under Ickes, being made assistant director of housing in the PWA at $8,000 a year, a place not previously filled.

In order to provide a job for Judge Wilson, a former congressman from Mississippi and a protege of Senator Harrison, a woman was forced off the federal parole board. Attorney General Cummings requested and obtained the resignation of Dr. Amy A. Stannard, a psychiatrist who has been in the government service 12 years with a civil service status and had been a member of the parole board since 1930. Wilson was sworn in as her successor.

WHAT IS WEALTH?

A woman has said in court that with $200,000 to her name she would not call herself rich. In another court a bankrupt said that he did not feel wealthy on $10,000 a year and sometimes was very hard up. An actress who had more than $20,000 a year has told how she had to spend $30,000. These people have missed a lot of fun. A man who feels rich because he has a dollar in his pocket is fifty times as well off as any of them. His is a grand and glorious feeling.—Manchester (Eng.) SYNOPSIS

Following his father's bitter criticism of his idle life, and the withdrawal of financial assistance, Hal Ireland, only son of a wealthy banker, finds himself practically without funds but with the promise of a situation in San Francisco, which city he must reach, from New York, within a definite time limit. He takes passage with a cross-country auto party on a "share expense" basis. With five other members of the party, an attractive girl, Barry Trafford; middle-aged Giles Kerrigan; Sister Anastasia, a nun; and an individual whom he instinctively dislikes, Martin Crack, he starts his journey. Barry's reticence annoys him. To Kerrigan he takes at once.

That faint visit of ominousness was finished now, with every one awake, crampedly stretching and resettling. Or was it finished? Had it simply returned to its hiding, to wait again? A silly thought. What could there be ominous in this shabby car, except the way Miller drove?

The flat strap of concrete curved, dipped and ran on into Pennsylvania and found the steel cities. Mrs. Pulsipher gave the impression of knowing it was a conspiracy—entered into by her husband, among others—that kept them from reaching Harrisburg while the visibility was good. John halfheartedly tried to get her to admit that the bridge lights, contained in glass stars, were beautiful; but she wouldn't. Her voice, as she asked Kerrigan what river this was, rang grim in familiarity with martyrdom. And her "Oh," when he told her it was the Susquehanna, implied she might tomorrow find out it had been the Tiber or the Yang-tze, and she robbed of the glamor.

Something was at work clearing the moody sluggishness from Hal's head. A drifting sense of loneliness, of melancholy that had seemed to belong with the broad river slowly mourning the sunset, ran away out of his spirit. He was, after all, a human being—with faculties compactly contained in a fit and useful body, and with rights to his own character. He was on his way to California, to a job, and to the confusion of his father.

Sullenness was nonsense, wasteful nonsense; premonition was nonsense. What could happen that he didn't want to have happen? Why make a whole fertile week blank by wanting nothing to happen, by ignoring his power to make things happen? His father had said Hal didn't know people, among other things—among almost all other things; well, he would arrive on the coast knowing at least seven and ready to dare the Old Man to believe any two of them.

He thought vividly of the Trafford girl behind him—her eyes, though he couldn't see them now, still solemnly absorbed in their own defensive continence. Far, far worse luck there could have been than this of catching a car that carried anyone so well favored, so challenging in looks as well as in manner. He smiled at thought of the challenge—undesigned, perhaps, but still a challenge. Prouder manners than that had been altered, and with less incentive. Look out, you blue-and-gold vixen; it makes me mad to be made mad, and I shall keep books on you from now on.

But Kerrigan first—for himself, for the character disguised under that scholarly remoteness of his brown eyes; and for the Trafford girl's proprietorship in him, her air almost of implying that they knew each other already. Careful, Ireland; first thing you know you'll be glad you've come.

"Kinda thought we'd put up at Harrisburg tonight," said Miller sleepily, his eyes sightless on the dim headlight beams that revealed curves barely in time.

"Harrisburg?" said Mrs. Pulsipher in quick suspicion; and Crack, shyly knowing, said: "We went through Harrisburg a half hour ago, bud."

Miller chuckled as if at something clever and turned to Kerrigan, his unshaven face sleepily pleased in the light from the dashboard. "Is that right?" he said.

"Yes," said Kerrigan.

Miller chuckled. "That's a good one," he said, and Hal shouted a sharp "Hey" at him as the white posts of a curve came filing swiftly at the front end. Miller returned his look to the road and pulled the wheel hard, but without apparent concern.

"It'll be another place up the road," he said. "Kinda like to see a garridge I likes the looks of. Get m'valves fixed."

He looked aside again, grinning; Kerrigan took the stubbly chin in his hand and turned it frontward. "Look where you're going, like a dear old party," he muttered. "I'll find you a factory, if you'll only watch where you're going."

"Thanks," said Hal with a laugh. "Think nothing of it," said Kerrigan. "Pleasure."

"If you can keep those eyes, or whatever they are, turned ahead, I might still be young when we get to the Coast."

"S'pose he'd let you drive?" said Kerrigan.

"Doubt it," said Hal.

Pulsipher snapped his fingers as if he'd just remembered something. "Hu-hu-hungry," he said.

"So'm I," said Mrs. Pulsipher. "We ought to stop for supper."

"Let's say the next town," said Kerrigan.

"Yes," said Mrs. Pulsipher.

"Awful hungry," said John.

So as they entered the next place, there were hopeful stirrings and estimates of the degree of civilization shown by the buildings.

"There, whirlwind," Kerrigan said to Miller. "A garage for princes. All white inside, and a mechanic in a white monkey-suit. You'll like it there and they'll like you."

In another moment a spasm seized Pulsipher, shooting out his arm and making him cry, "Whoa! Eat, it says: look, that sign. Eat."

"It looks clean," said Mrs. Pulsipher mistrustfully.

"Clean's a horse-chestnut shell, ma'am," said Kerrigan. "Shall we try it?"

"Yes yes yes," said Pulsipher quickly, so that no one could beat him with doubts.

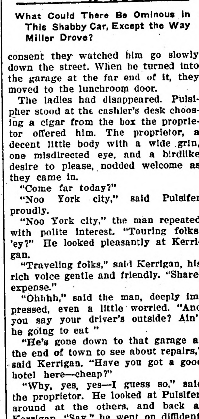
They got out stiffly. The ladies and Pulsipher went in. Hal and Kerrigan stayed to hear the momentous plan in ferment behind Miller's bleary eyes, with Crack leaning quietly against the car to listen.

"Y'see," said Miller, "it's mountains on the road pretty soon and it'd be kinda nice to get them valves fixed 'fore we get to 'em."

"Good idea," said Kerrigan, "A kitty. And so?"

"Well," said Miller, chuckling at having figured it out by himself, "why don't I go back to that garridge and kinda look around and see what it looks like while you folks start eatin'? Then if I like the looks and the price is right, I'll leave her there and we can put up in this place."

He ground the gears portentously, and the car lumbered up on the opposite curb as he turned around. By tacit consent they watched him go slowly down the street. When he turned into the garage at the far end of it, they moved to the lunchroom door.



What Could There Be Ominous in This Shabby Car, Except the Way Miller Drove?

The ladies had disappeared. Pulsipher stood at the cashier's desk choosing a cigar from the box the proprietor offered him. The proprietor, a decent little body with a wide grin, one misdirected eye, and a birdlike desire to please, nodded welcome as they came in.

"Come far today?"

"Noo York city," said Pulsifer proudly.

"Noo York city," the man repeated with polite interest. "Touring folks, 'ey?" He looked pleasantly at Kerrigan.

"Traveling folks," said Kerrigan, his rich voice gentle and friendly. "Share-expense."

"Ohhhh," said the man, deeply impressed, even a little worried. "And you say your driver's outside? Ain't he going to eat "

"He's gone down to that garage at the end of town to see about repairs," said Kerrigan. "Have you got a good hotel here—cheap?"

"Why, yes, yes—I guess so," said the proprietor. He looked at Pulsifer, around at the others, and back at Kerrigan. "Say," he went on diffidently, "I don't like to butt into you folks' business, but—but has this feller got your grips an' all with him?"

"Yes," said Crack, his indolence pierced by direct interest; "and our fares to California."

There was a moment of silence, and the proprietor's attention sharpened on Kerrigan. "Well," he said, "you folks are probably all right, but they was a party like you—what d'ye call it—share-expense? They was a party over Lewistown way got hung up by a feller't went to get some repairs. They never did see him again. An' the Chambera Commerce had to chip in to get a couple of 'em back t'Noo York."

Kerrigan looked round at Hal in grave inquiry. In the newly empty silence, Hal felt Barry's eyes on him and he turned to her, ready to mock any share she took in this apprehension. But she had no share in it. Her look, full at him, was warm and secure in scorn, without sympathy or appeal; and the faint, untaunting smile at her closed lips said fearlessly, This will happen for all of you: your luggage and your money don't matter; and if yours don't, why should these other peoples'—to you? Without haste, her eyes confirmed his unimportance and turned away.

He swung around toward the door—the thing having happened so quickly that the silence of awe was still fresh on the others. "I'll go," he said to Kerrigan. And without the faintest notion of what he would do—only an angry urgency in him to do something—he posted out by the screen door and helped it slam hard behind him. One way or another, you—whatever-you are—you'll pay for all this.

Miller's mind was too much drugged with chronic sleepiness and stupidity to think of running out with car, luggage, and fares. But just suppose some habit of crookedness were channeled through his stupidity. Suppose—Hal looked more sharply at the glare of lights and his step brightened. D—n the girl. The scoring for today was surely on her side. Tomorrow was another day. Hal's gray eyes stirred with merriment. To find his way past those solemn defenses of hers would be a zestful job; to chasten that clear, willful cussedness amounted to a necessity now, a duty as well as a pleasure.

Hal was walking out with decision when he cleared the last building. And there in the white light of the yard stood the long-suffering car with its corded bale of luggage behind. Hal gave a laugh, half relief, half triumph. It would be fun to press that into her steady blue eyes when he got back.

Through the plate glass of the office he could see Miller talking to a man in a white monkey-suit. Something in Miller's attitude was different; not precisely an alertness, but the sleepy suggestion of interest, of purpose almost. If I go, Hal thought, she'll say my coming made him change his mind; if I just stand here watching, he can get away as clean as if I were back there eating the dinner for which my system decorously calls.

He stood another moment trying to define the change in Miller's listless posture. Then he walked carefully over gravel to the car, carefully opened the door—his eyes watchful of the office—and climbed into the tonneau. On the floor behind the jump-seat there was room in which to lie curled and hidden.

It was faintly exciting—like a time Hal remembered when he had listened behind a curtain in the dining room while his governess told the butler how she would punish him for being late to his supper. And what a fine ass he'd look if Miller found him there.

There were voices soon, and the crunch of gravel under slow feet. "I kinda thought," Miller was saying, "it was some purty good hills over there, but I jus' didn't remember where they begun." He chuckled in sleepy cleverness.

"Well, good night," said another voice; and Miller said, "Sure."

The car tipped creaking toward one running board, the door slammed, and Miller's short, contemplative breathing sounded close overhead. Hal steeled himself to be touched, but then there was the hard catch and churning of the starter. A lurch over the curb confused his judgment of the direction in which Miller turned. But quickly the car was in high, and running fast; it was the open road under them, and Hal's breath stood still for a suspended instant of dismay.

Then he was good and angry—anger flooding his joints and his purpose with warm lubricant. By G—d, their best clothes, probably, and their money—snatched from them by this animal, this drugged ape! As he raised himself from the floor, Hal had a savage wonder whether Kerrigan would like to fill the hole in his collection of experience by killing Miller.

His next act suggested itself as glibly as if he'd done this sort of thing often. He doubled his right forefinger and, kneeling on one of the jump seats, leaned forward and pushed the knuckle against Miller's ribs. Miller didn't start or tremble or look around, but the car began wearily to slow down.

"Pull up to the side," Hal said, disgust flattening out the anger in his voice.

Miller obeyed—gently, as if he had been chauffeur to old ladies.

"Now," said Hal, "I want your wallet with all the money, your license, and your registration." Miller's futile fingers took out the fat, shabby wallet and spread its compartments to show everything. Hal put it into an inside pocket and took his knuckle from Miller's ribs.

"Slide into the other seat," said Hal. Miller obeyed, with a strange, sleepy air of gratitude. Hal stepped out of the tonneau and got into the front without looking at Miller's face.

"Ever been in jail?" Hal asked him as the car started.

"Yes," said Miller, very low.

"Want to go again?"

"No," said Miller.

Hal ran past a farm road, backed the car into it, and swung out on the highway again toward the town. Miller parted his lips with a sticky sound and cleared his throat.

"I was jus' takin' her up the road to kinda try out an' see . . ."

"Don't speak unless you're spoken to," said Hal quietly. "Get it?"

"Yes," Miller whispered.

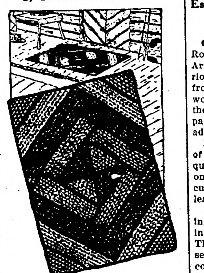
Log Cabin Effect in Crocheted Rug

By GRANDMOTHER CLARK



Log cabins are always picturesque, and the many antiques usually found about the place add much to complete the picture.

We can't all live in cabins, but we can satisfy our antique cravings by giving these ideas some space in our homes.

This "Log Cabin" crocheted rug was developed from the old "Log Cabin" quilt which is known to many of our readers. This model measures 28x42 inches and requires about 4 pounds of rag rug material.

The inner square of 4 triangles is made first. Four elongated pieces of same size form the first row around center, two short and two long pieces form the next or second row. Four pieces of same size from the third row. Four same size triangles fit in corners. Slip-stitch sections together in black and single crochet all around in black. Color scheme may be all brown in light and dark shades or mixed colors. Alternate panels in light and dark shades to give contrast to rows. Measure each section as the work progresses and fit sections into spaces. Rag rug material may vary in weights.

Grandmother Clark's Rug Book No. 24 contains full directions for making this rug, and many others that will interest you. All illustrations in colors. Postpaid, 15c.

Eskimos Unworried by Little Matter of Heat

Constable McGinnis, in charge of Royal Canadian Mounted Police Arctic detail at Pangnirtong, is seriously considering shipping Eskimos from his district to the South for work in tropical spots too hot for the natives to stand, says a newspaper dispatch from Toronto, Canada.

McGinnis was entertaining a group of a dozen or more Eskimos in his quarters last winter. He fed them on biscuits and tea and, after the customary talk, waited for them to leave. They didn't.

Not wanting to hurt their feelings, the constable commenced hinting for them to return to their igloos. They paid no attention to him, but, seated in a circle around the stove, continued to puff away stolidly on their pipes.

Finally the constable was seized with an inspiration. If they would not go voluntarily he would make it so uncomfortable for them that they would have to leave.

He went to the shed and returned with a big load of fuel which he piled into the stove. He then opened the drafts, closed all the doors and left the room. He waited 15 minutes for signs of the natives' departure, but in vain. He re-entered. The Eskimos had not stirred from their places despite the fact that the stove was red hot and perspiration ran in streams down their faces.

McGinnis thought of another plan to get rid of his unwelcome guests. Walking to a corner of the room, he picked up a can, took a handful of the contents and cannily spread it on the stove. It was red pepper. The constable fled outside fully expecting the Eskimos to follow. They didn't, and the next morning when he returned to the post after spending the night in other quarters, found the guests snoring contentedly on the floor, unaffected by heat or pepper.

CHILDREN'S HOBBIES

It is wise to allow children to choose their own hobbies, as hobbies that are forced upon them often turn out failures. If the mother can arrange it, she should provide a definite place in which the children can exercise their hobbies. If the hobby is the rearing of animals or birds, the mother should impress on the children that their pets are not toys or playthings, and that they must be loved and cared for. There is a greater likelihod of a hobby turning out a success if the mother gives the child to understand that the success or failure of the hobby depends entirely upon the child.

constituting a majority of the members of the council.

The President of the council, Mr. Sam Lorentson, called the meeting to order and presided thereat, and the clerk, Mr. Geo. Frirker acted as clerk of the meeting.

The President then stated that the Interstate Power Company, a Delaware corporation, with offices at Dubuque, Iowa, had made a proposal to amend the contract entered into on the 14th day of July, 1924, by making a supplementary agreement, which will eliminate the Trustee as provided for in the original agreement of July 14th, 1924, and all payments to be made hereafter will be made directly to the Village of Holt, instead of being made to the Trustee as provided for in the original agreement.

The President then read the proposed agreement, a copy of which is attached hereto, and made a part hereof.

THIS AGREEMENT, made and entered into this 8th day if August, 1935, by and between the VILLAGE OF HOLT, MARSHALL COUNTY, MINNESOTA, (hereinafter called "Municipality") and INTERSTATE POWER COMPANY, a Delaware Corporation, with offices in Dubuque, Iowa, (hereinafter called "Company"),

WITNESSETH:

THAT, WHEREAS, on the 14th day of July, 1924, the Municipality entered into a certain contract in writing with the Minnesota Electric Distributing Company, a Minnesota Corporation, for the sale and delivery on July 14th, 1944, by the Municipality to the said Minnesota Electric Distributing Company of the electric distributing system, street lighting system, sub-station, service connections and all appurtenances thereto, then being constructed for the Municipality, in consideration of the said Minnesota Electric Distributing Company paying the sum of Six Hundred Thirty Dollars ($630.00) per year in semi-annual payments on the first days of June and December of each year, for a period of twenty (20) years, which payments were to be deposited with the Marshall County State Bank, Holt, Minnesota, as Trustee, and which Bank agreed to pay from said sum so paid to it the interest on certain bonds in the aggregate sum of Seven Thousand Dollars ($7,000.00), issued by said Municipality in payment of its electrical distributing system, when and as the same shall become due and payable; and

WHEREAS, the Company is the assignee of and successor in interest to said Minnesota Electric Distributing Company and all of its right, title and interest in and to said contract; and

WHEREAS, the parties hereto are desirous of having all funds which are now held by the Marshall County State Bank, Holt, Minnesota, as Trustee, paid over to the Municipality immediately, and of arranging a method of making payments hereafter to become due without such payments being made to said Trustee;

NOW, THEREFORE, for and in consideration of the mutual covenants and agreements herein contained, the parties hereto agree as follows:

(1) That all payments agreed to be made by the Company to the Trustee under said agreement dated July 14, 1924, up to and including the payment due June 1, 1935, have been made, and there is now on deposit in the Trust Fund Account held by the said Marshall County State Bank, Holt, Minnesota, the sum of Twenty-eight Hundred Sixty-two and 33-100, ($2,862.33), which sum is to be released by said Trustee and is to be paid to the Village of Holt upon written order executed by both parties hereto.

(2) That the Marshall County State Bank, Holt, Minnesota, upon payment of said sum of Twenty-eight Hundred Sixty-two and 33-100 ($2,862.33) to said Municipality, shall be relieved of any further liability or responsibility under said agreements.

(3) That the Company shall pay direct to the Municipality the sum of Three Hundred Fifteen Dollars ($315.00) on the first days of June and December of each year hereafter, the first of such payments to be made on December 1, 1935, and the last to be made on June 1, 1944; such payments to bear no interest, and when eighteen (18) payments of Three Hundred Fifteen Dollars ($315.00) each have been made, it shall constitute a full compliance by the Company of all of the terms and conditions of said contract of July 14, 1924.

The Municipality agrees to forthwith execute and deliver to a Trust Company, to be selected by the Company, the proper and necessary conveyances and bills of sale satisfactory in form to the Company, of the properties hereinbefore described, with instructions to said Trust Company to deliver said conveyances and bills of sale to the Company on June 1, 1944, upon presentation to it of receipts evidencing full payment of the amounts stipulated in this paragraph (3) hereof.

Said contract of July 14, 1924, is hereby amended to strike out paragraphs (19) and (20) thereof.

(4) That except as hereby modified and amended, said contract of July 14, 1924, shall remain in full force and effect.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, the parties hereto have caused this instrument to be executed by their respective officers thereunto duly authorized and their respective corporate seals to be hereunto affixed the day and year first above written.

RESOLUTION:

WHEREAS, The State Emergency Relief Administration has presented to the Board of County Commissioners a request that the county appropriate $17,800.00 for the calendar year of 1935, and a like sum for 1936, for poor relief and work relief expenditures, and,

WHEREAS, The County Commissioners are anxious to reduce the number of relief clients and get the relief problem on a basis where the county can take it over and carry the entire load, while the local State Emergency Relief Administration is not seemingly so inclined, and,

WHEREAS, The members of the local relief office have not worked in harmony with the Board of County Commissioners, and,

WHEREAS, The Board of County Commissioners feels that they should have partial control of the relief office, and of the selection of the employees thereof, and the manner in which the relief funds are distributed, and,

WHEREAS, the State Emergency Relief Administration has made a careful and exhaustive study of the financial condition of the counties, including their capacity to pay, their indebtedness, their credit and future financial outlook and the relief needs of the County, and has arrived at an equitable basis of distribution as required by Chapter 51, Section 5, of the financial burden as between the various counties of the State,

NOW, THEREFORE BE IT RESOLVED by the Board of County Commissioners that the County of Marshall, in consideration of the allotment and administration of poor and work relief funds as above set forth, agrees to appropriate and set aside in the poor fund of the County, or make otherwise available the sum of $17,800.00 for the calendar year 1935 and a like sum for the calendar year 1936, for the purpose of poor relief and work relief expenditures.

Senate Praised For AAA Vote By Bureau Leader

Congress Made Right Decision On Momentous Question, Jones Says

One of the most important decisions ever placed before congress was decided in the farmers' favor when on Tuesday of last week the United States senate passed legislation that seems to assure continuance of the AAA program, says J. S. Jones, secretary-treasurer of the Minnesota Farm Bureau. Less than a month ago rural America was shocked at the possibilities of the Boston federal court decision, which indicated the destruction of the AAA. Up to and including Monday of last week farmers were deeply concerned and fearful that the progress in farm recovery would be nullified through congressional failure to pass new AAA legislation.

Actively showing their concern farmers throughout the country, individually and through their county and state Farm Bureau offices, began flooding congress with petitions that the AAA be supported. On Monday of last week, E. A. O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, made a nationwide appeal to all farmers, and all persons interested in agricultural welfare, to flood congress with telegraphed petitions demanding action. The harvest of years of Farm Bureau effort was reaped on the following morning, when congressmen found themselves flooded with appeals that agriculture be given a chance to perpetuate itself. On that day, Tuesday, July 23, legislation was passed by the Senate that points the way toward sound and sure agricultural progress, Mr. Jones declared. House concurrence in the senate's action seemed assured, the Washington office of the Farm Bureau found in a poll of members of the House.

"The farmers' victory is doubly appreciated by those who realize the tremendous pressure brought on congress to kill the farm recovery program through nullifying the AAA. Packers, processors, public utilities and certain consumer groups have fought AAA legislation through one of the most high pressure lobbies ever set up at Washington. They spared neither money nor energy in their fight. Their failure to kill the Triple A program is due only to the fact that farmers were better organized than they were," Mr. Jones said.

Melvin C. Passolt, director of the state bureau of criminal apprehension, was recently in Washington studying the methods of the U. S. department of justice. Mr. Passolt was particularly interested in the finger print division of that department, which he examined closely. He hopes in the near future to give Minnesota a similar set-up.

Bureau Reports Wide Interest In Electric Program

Farm Bureau Gets Many Requests For Information on Establishing Service

Widespread interest in rural electrification in shown in queries made of the Minnesota Farm Bureau Federation for information on setting up local projects, federation officials announced today. Through the Federal Rural Electrification administration funds will be loaned, at low rates of interest, to groups proving their ability to set up electric distribution systems and operate them efficiently. A number of County Farm Bureaus have already made much progress in preparing surveys of local possibilities and have filed their applications at Washington.

The Minnesota planning board also has made some surveys, and have compiled considerable data upon which applications will be made to the federal administration for financial backing.

The Farm Bureau took a leading part in obtaining administration approval of the federal program, and in the establishment of this new rural service it sees a victory for organized rural effort equal in importance to any project ever undertaken in the United States.

The state federation has offered its full co-operation to Morris Cooke, federal administrator, in getting his program under way in Minnesota. All applications for service must be made to Mr. Cooke, at Washington, D. C. Neither state nor regional offices have been established, Mr. Cooke announces. The Minnesota Farm Bureau, St. Paul, will furnish data sheets to all who are interested in starting a project.

Corn-Hog Contract Signers Must Raise 25 Per Cent Of Base

Minnesota corn-hog contract signers who this year fail to produce, or who do not at least try to produce, at least 25 per cent of their 1932-33 base hog production, may be disqualified from receiving their 1935 hog payments, warns H. G. Bolstad, University Farm, St. Paul, state corn-hog compliance agent for Minnesota.

He urges all those who have not yet had farrowed on their farms at least 25 per cent of the number of litters they had farrowed, on the average, in 1932-33, to arrange for such farrowing as soon as possible, or be prepared to forfeit their payments. Litters farrowed any time before December 1 will count toward the fulfillment of each producer's quota, he says.

With large numbers of piggy sows being sold every day to the packers, and with feed crop prospects in almost all parts of the state the best they have been for several years, practically every contract signer should be able to comply with this requirement, Mr. Bolstad believes.

Furthermore, he points out, since finished hogs are selling at the highest price since 1930, the opportunity to make money in hog raising is unusually good this year.

4,880 Minnesota Farmers Served Through PCA's

Six hundred sixty-five Minnesota farmers who are members of Production Credit Associations obtained $336,398 from their local associations in June, according to the June report of the Production Credit Corporation of St. Paul.

Up to date this year there have been 4,880 Minnesota farmers who have obtained production loans through these farmer-controlled associations. The total volume to date is $2,128,914.

The St. Paul corporation also supervises associations in Michigan, Wisconsin and North Dakota, and there were 2,351 loans in the four states for the month, totaling $998,387.

This large volume of loans, however, indicates a falling off from the peak of the season. In April there were 4,088 loans in the district for a total of more than $1,542,000, since which time there has been a gradual decline.

Rapid expansion of the local associations was indicated by President George Susens of the Production Credit Corporation. He said that at the end of last December there were 13,498 members who had obtained loans during 1934, compared with 15,939 who have obtained loans in the first 6 months of 1935; and that the total volume of loans for the half-year is approximately $100,000 greater than for all of last year.

"While we may expect the volume of our loans to be less during the next 60 days than during the seeding and pruning season in the spring, we anticipate a substantial demand throughout the summer and the fruit-picking season, and a great increase in business with the coming of grain harvest and the fall livestock run," Mr. Susens said.

WOOL HEARINGS ARE POSTPONED

A scheduled series of public hearings on a proposal to license dealers in wool and mohair has been postponed, according to word received at University Farm, St. Paul, from the Agricultural Adjustment Administration.

Action on the proposal to license such dealers will be put off until Congress has determined the status of wool and mohair under the amendments to the Agricultural Adjustment Act now pending, the announcement states.

President's Way of Ending Virgin Islands Row Arouses Criticism—Senator Black Probes for Truth About Utilities Cigar Box.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© Western Newspaper Union.

THAT row over the administration of the Virgin Islands was so unpleasant that President Roosevelt felt impelled to settle it himself. So he removed from office the two chief battlers, Gov. Paul M. Pearson and Judge T. Webber Wilson, had other jobs found for them, and nominated as Pearson's successor Lawrence W. Cramer, who was serving as lieutenant governor of St. Croix island.

L. W. Cramer

Confirmation of the latter appointment was not immediate. The senate committee investigating the island affairs was slow in making up its mind about Cramer, and from St. Thomas came the news that the foes of the Pearson administration there, together with a delegation from St. Croix, were protesting vigorously against the President's selection of a new governor.

The Emancipator, opposition paper, said editorially:

"The islanders would about as soon have Pearson, for under Cramer no change of policy can be expected. Poor and unknown as the humble people of the Virgin Islands may be, they are entitled to an example of honor and courage from the President of the American Republic."

The disposal of Pearson and Wilson also aroused criticism in Washington. The former has been attacked steadily by Pat Harrison of Mississippi and other Democratic senators, but Secretary of the Interior Ickes had defended him warmly, so he was given a job under Ickes, being made assistant director of housing in the PWA at $8,000 a year, a place not previously filled.

In order to provide a job for Judge Wilson, a former congressman from Mississippi and a protege of Senator Harrison, a woman was forced off the federal parole board. Attorney General Cummings requested and obtained the resignation of Dr. Amy T. Stannard, a psychiatrist who has been in the government service 12 years with a civil service status and had been a member of the parole board since 1930. Wilson was sworn in as her successor. Since Wilson's qualifications for the place appeared to be chiefly political, observers in Washington noted sadly that the parole board was getting back into political hands.

PARTIAL investigation of the milk industry by the federal trade commission was said to have revealed deplorable conditions and the administration asked for $200,000 to continue the inquiry. The senate committee in considering the deficiency appropriation bill cut out that item altogether, but when the measure came before the senate Duffy of Wisconsin moved an amendment adding the sum asked. After a hot debate this was approved by a vote of 51 to 18 and the bill was then passed. The numerous senate amendments had added a total of more than $80,000,000 to the house measure, so the $306,000,000 bill was sent to conference.

WHAT was in the cigar box wrapped in a newspaper? That is what Senator Hugo Black, chairman of the senate lobby committee, wanted to know. Before the committee for questioning was John W. Carpenter of Dallas, president of the Texas Power and Light company. He admitted freely that he and other utility men had hotel conferences, dinners and a trip down Chesapeake bay with congressmen during the fight over the Wheeler-Rayburn bill, and that he himself had centered his efforts on Texas congressmen. But of the mysterious box he could or would tell nothing. Black probed and probed, and finally asked:

Senator Black

"Do you still say that in the morning (of the day before the vote on the utilities bill 'death sentence') you didn't give a congressman a box wrapped up in a newspaper?"

Carpenter replied quietly: "I don't think I did, unless it was a few cigars."

Senate and house conferees met to consider the utility control bill, but there were small signs that they could get together, and one session ended abruptly in a real row. Two administration lobbyists, Benjamin Cohen and Dozier A. De Vane, were brought into the executive session by Senators Wheeler and Barkley and though Representative George Huddleston protested, their continued presence was insisted upon. Whereupon the fiery Alabama congressman and his fellows from the house walked out and broke up the meeting. Cohen is generally given credit for writing the measure and Wheeler has said he knows all about it.

After leaving the committee room, Huddleston said flatly that the house conferees would not recede from the position that the "death sentence" must be eliminated.

OPPONENTS of the AAA amendments designed to strengthen the powers of Secretary of Agriculture Wallace decided to let the basic act go up to the Supreme court, so the administration bill was passed by the senate with only 15 adverse votes.

Both Republican and conservative Democratic foes of the AAA are confident that the Supreme court will hold the basic act unconstitutional and an early test is assured by a senate amendment permitting suits to recover processing taxes that have not been passed on to producers or consumers. One of the major purposes of the amendments was to close the courts, but the senate rejected this scheme by a vote of 41 to 23. As a result, the Hoosack Mills case, in which the Boston Circuit Courts of Appeals held the AAA unconstitutional, will not be thrown out and the highest tribunal will have a chance to pass upon it.

Amid so much adverse criticism, the action of the Midwest farm leaders gathered in Chicago must have been soothing to Mr. Wallace. Resolutions were passed praising the secretary and congressional leaders for their efforts in behalf of "agricultural equality."

The farm leaders urged senate approval for the commodity exchange bill, passed by the house, and asked re-establishment of the Pacific Northwest Wheat Export corporation under the AAA to prevent wheat surpluses in that area from competing with Midwest wheat and other grains.

The meeting voiced opposition to the plans for transportation co-ordination, suggesting farmers would profit more by competition among carriers.

IMMEDIATE convocation of the League of Nations council to deal with the Italo-Ethiopian question was demanded by Haile Selassie, emperor of Ethiopia. On his behalf the demand was telegraphed to the league secretariat at Geneva by Tacla Hawariat, Ethiopian minister to France and delegate to the league. He insisted that the council proceed to the examination of the situation under article XV of the league covenant, Ethiopia invoking this article because of the "threat to her independence from Italy."

Emperor Haile Selassie

British dispatches said Prime Minister Stanley Baldwin and leading members of his cabinet were believed to favor full league action, if other nations agree, as a last resort to avert the threatened conflict. Diplomatic quarters in London heard that the British government probably would alter its policy and permit export of arms to Ethiopia. The emperor's new minister there, W. C. Martin, had a conference at the foreign office and came out smiling happily, but saying nothing.

Previously Mr. Martin had admitted that Ethiopia was short not only of arms but also of money.

"At the moment we have very little money," he said. "I am doing all that is possible to raise loans in London, but thus far I have not met with a great measure of success.

"Stories have been published that there are large secret funds available and that Emperor Haile Selassie has a treasure hoard of gold and jewels, but that is wrong. I am over here to offer concessions for gold, copper, and oil in return for loans, but the London bankers with whom I have had discussions do not seem willing to part with their money. The attitude of the City of London men seems to be that if Italy defeats Ethiopia it will not recognize concessions granted other countries by Ethiopia."

TOM HEFLIN of Alabama once more is on the federal pay roll. The big former senator and representative who was beaten in 1930 by Bankhead has accepted an appointment as administrative assistant for the Atlanta district of the federal housing administration. The job pays $4,800 a year.

EMPEROR HAILE SELASSIE appeared before the Ethiopian parliament and made an impassioned appeal to his countrymen to fight Italy to the death, declaring he had prepared himself to die in the contest if need be.

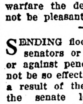
"Ethiopia knows how to fight to preserve its independence and its sovereignty," he said.

Though the League of Nations council was scheduled to meet for consideration of the Italo-Ethiopian quarrel between July 25 and August 2, there were indications that the European nations were about ready to abandon Ethiopia to its fate and that if "The Lion of Judah" doesn't give in completely, Mussolini will be permitted to have his way with him. That probably will mean a long guerrilla warfare the details of which will not be pleasant reading.

SENDING floods of telegrams to senators or representatives for or against pending legislation will not be so effective in the future, as a result of the disclosures before the senate lobby investigators. They heard evidence to the effect that large numbers of telegrams against the utilities bill were sent from Warren, Pa., by an employee of the Associated Gas and Electric system, that the messages were signed with names taken from a city directory and that the originals were destroyed at Warren.

DROPPING all their rebellious indignation, the Democrats of the house did everything the administration wished in considering the social security bill as altered by the senate. The conferees had settled all differences after two weeks of hard work, but one of the amendments they accepted was that permitting private pension systems to function under the measure. The majority members of the house were informed that President Roosevelt was opposed to this, so they refused to accept it. The senate would not permit the elimination of the amendment, so back to conference went the bill.

SENATOR HUEY LONG has the political fate of his chief opponent, Mayor T. Semmes Walmsley of New Orleans, in the palm of his hand. But he is forcing the people of the city to put the mayor out. A majority of Walmsley's followers, tired of the conflict, formally deserted him when the commission council adopted a resolution endorsing recent statements of two commissioners calling for the city to make peace with Long. The mayor, standing almost alone, declined to yield. He told the council he "would not deal with men who have been called 'crooks and thieves' by every member of the commission council."



T. Semmes Walmsley

In a caucus preceding the council session, 13 of Walmsley's 17 ward leaders voted for his resignation "for the good of the city." The mayor told them he was "going to stick from h—l to breakfast." Senator Long received a committee of the seceders and said he would call a session of the state legislature to force Walmsley out of office within 28 hours after the "old regulars" obtained approval of a majority of the city's voters for a petition requesting the mayor's removal.

CHARLES TAUSSIG, who had served the administration for two years without official title or position, has been appointed chairman of the advisory committee of the National Youth administration. In announcing the creation of the NYA the President allocated to it $50,000,000 of works-relief funds.

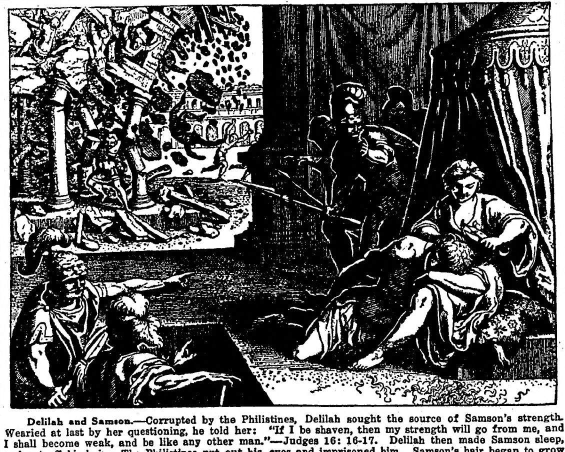
UNOFFICIALLY and informally, the general opinion seems to be that the Wagner labor disputes act is unconstitutional and will be so declared by the United States Supreme court when that tribunal is called on for a decision. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, urges labor leaders to pay no attention to claims that the law is invalid.

"Leading legal authorities of the nation are of the opinion that the act is constitutional in every respect," he wrote, but added in a letter that he expects a court test and that the American Federation of Labor will get "the best legal talent."

Even if the Wagner law is knocked out by the Supreme court, the administration believes it has a plan that will avert at least 90 per cent of the usual number of strikes, walk-outs, lock-outs and other disorders. It is being launched in Toledo, Ohio, and has been called the "Toledo plan" because it was conceived by Assistant Secretary of Labor Edward F. McGrady when he was trying to settle a dispute in that Ohio city.

Here again Green throws a monkeywrench into the machinery. He says the A. F. of L. will not cooperate in promoting the McGrady plan because it provides that the mediation panels would include on the labor side representatives of company unions and of independent and rival unions. Under Green's leadership the policy of the A. F. of L. evidently is all for the federation, or nothing for anyone.

The Story of the Bible Told in Pictures



Delilah and Samson.—Corrupted by the Philistines, Delilah sought the source of Samson's strength. Wearied at last by her questioning, he told her: "If I be shaven, then my strength will go from me, and I shall become weak, and be like any other man."—Judges 16: 16-17. Delilah then made Samson sleep, and cut off his hair. The Philistines put out his eyes and imprisoned him. Samson's hair began to grow again, however, and one day when the Philistines gathered to make sacrifices to their god, Samson was called in to make sport for them. Samson asked to be led to the pillars which supported the house, and took hold. And Samson said, Let me die with the Philistines. And he bowed himself with all his might; and the house fell upon the people therein. So the dead which he slew at his death were more than they which he slew in his life."—Judges 16: 30. In the right foreground Merian, Seventeenth century engraver, shows Samson being taken by the Philistines, and in the left background he shows the destruction of the house and the death of Samson.

WEEKLY NEWS LETTER FROM WASHINGTON

By Congressman Elmer J. Ryan

The appropriation of $200,000 to extend and continue the Federal Trade Commission investigation of unfair practice of milk distributors was added to the second deficiency bill on the floor of the Senate after it had been stricken from the bill in committee. The proposal to continue the investigation through the added funds had the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture and the President. The amendment placing the appropriation in the bill was proposed and advocated on the floor by Senator F. Ryan Duffy of Wisconsin.

The President's policy of abandoning the furnishing of direct relief and the transfer of employable persons from direct relief to works projects under the Works Progress Administration is the outstanding problem confronting the emergency relief set-up at the present time.

In his original message to this Congress, the President stated his purpose of taking the Federal Government out of the field of direct relief. The Works Progress Administration was set up for the purpose of carrying out this policy. It is planned that when the Works Progress Administration gets under way that all persons in need of relief, who cannot be employed on works projects, will have to be cared for by the states and local units of Government.

A recent report of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration covering the months of January and February, 1935, indicates that 102,581 Minnesota families were cared for through relief agencies in January and 102,825 families in February. 23,274 single persons were given relief in January and 25,448 in February. The people on relief constituted about nineteen per cent of the total population of the state.

The relief load throughout the country has been handled through direct grants or gifts by the Federal Government to the states. The money has been expended largely under the control of the state authorities through the several state emergency relief administrations. This procedure has been followed in Minnesota.

The report shows that for the year 1933 the Federal Government supplied 52.9% of the relief funds expended in Minnesota. The state supplied two-tenths of one per cent of the funds and local Governmental units supplied 46.9%.

For the year 1934, the Federal Government suplied 81.1%. The state 5.5% and local units 13.4%.

The total percentages of relief funds for the two years are: Federal, 75.4%; State, 4.4%; Local, 20.2%.

According to the FERA report, the average relief allowances per family have been higher in Minnesota than in any other states classed in the report as West Central States.

Average monthly relief allowances for Minnesota in January 1935 were $29.31 per family for the rural portions of the state and $42.76 per family in the principal cities of the state. In February, the relief families in the principal cities received an average of $37.15 per family, while relief families in those portions of the state outside of the principal cities, received an average of $28.07 per family.

The plan of the Works Progress Administration, now being set up throughout the country, is that all employable persons shall be given employment and those in need of direct relief shall be cared for by the states and local Government bodies.

A bulletin, recently published by the headquarters of the National Youth Administration, indicates the opportunities which will be offered by the Government to young people in need of part time employment to aid in their education.

Students, who are able to do high-grade college work, may apply to the college which they wish to attend, asking for assignment to the part time jobs being provided by the National Youth Administration.

All colleges are eligible to participate in the program and it is estimated that the part time jobs will enable students to earn an average of $15.00 per month while attending school.

The AAA amendments have finally, after lengthy debate, passed the Senate. An important controversy centered around provisions which would bar law suits to regain or to prevent payment of processing taxes on constitutional grounds. As the bill finally passed the Senate, it provided that processors could only recover the taxes in cases where they are able to prove that they themselves paid the tax and they did not pass it on to the consumer.

CAMPING FACILITIES TO BE IMPROVED ON STATE FORESTS

Establishment of camp grounds on state forests and state lands will be stressed this summer in northern Minnesota, according to Grover Conzet, Director of the State Division of Forestry and Fire Prevention. Physical improvements will be made under the Emergency Conservation Work program of the Federal government with work to be done by members of the Civilian Conservation Corps.

Preliminary plans have been completed following surveys of desirable locations, Mr. Conzet said. Picnic grounds will be developed and scenic sites improved. Overnight camps will be provided at strategical points and regular tourist camp sites will be included in the program. Camping for fishermen will be accomplished with better facilities along highways and well known trout streams.

Purposes of state forest camp grounds development are to concentrate the use of fire in protected and safe areas and thus reduce fire hazards.

Mr. Conzet pointed out that "the camp grounds will make recreational uses of state forests more easily available to the average citizen." Minnesota's scenic beauties and wealth of natural resources will be more advantageously displayed and conservation will be encouraged and fostered with the general public as a result of recreational improvements on the state forests.

LIGHTNING RACES THROUGH FARM HOME

Ely—Nature was evidently in a playful mood last Thursday evening when lightning struck the farm home of John Bouska, 8 miles south of Ely. Entering the house via incoming electric wires the bolt, in the form of a red ball of fire, raced crazily through the entire house and crashed out of the roof. Following the electric wiring the bolt blew out all the light sockets, fuses and radio tubes. Insulators were cracked to bits as occupants of the house watched the ball of fire race from room to room. Reaching the attic, the bolt jumped to a huge rafter, reducing it to splinters before bursting a hole in the roof to escape.

HORSE'S LIP PIERCED BY A STRAY BULLET

Bertha—A stray bullet from some sportsman's gun pierced the lip of a plow horse on the Eleanore Sahli farm two and a half miles southwest of Bertha. Ben Volkman was driving the team behind the plow, when one of the horses suddenly halted and became very nervous. Examination disclosed that the horse's lower lip near the jaw bone had a bullet wound in it big enough to thrust a finger through. Volkman stated that he heard no gunshot at the time and apparently the bullet had traveled a considerable distance. Evidently the hunter was in a patch of woods and had shot into the air at a crow. It is thought that the shot glanced into the field where Volkman was working.

HUNGRY BURGLARS TAKE PIE, LEAVE CASH

Canby—J. E. Nelson, proprietor of a Canby restaurant, stood treat on a recent morning to a band of unknown, uninvited guests, as he found after they had made their stealthy departure. Some one pried open the front door of the cafe between midnight and one o'clock and took a lemon pie, a pumpkin pie, a quantity of rolls, candy, gum, peanuts and several cartons of cigarettes, all amounting to about $25 worth. They did not molest the cash register, however. It was concluded that the bright light over the register kept them away. The cafe was closed a midnight and at one o'clock Night Policeman Oscar C. Snortum found the door open. Any one whose favorite pie is lemon or pumpkin is subject to close scrutiny by local sleuths.

RAISES MUSTACHE TO LOOK LIKE CUT

Columbia Heights—The trials and tribulations of the politician are many, especially at election time. Take, for instance, the case of L. A. Tjosvold, councilman, who is running for re-election in the Columbia Heights primaries. Discovering that he was out of campaign cards, Tjosvold decided to have A 1 Ovshak print him up a couple of thousand. There was only one hitch in the plan. The picture which he had printed on his cards four years ago showed him with a mustache, which he had since shaved off. Not to be outdone, Tjosvold started out resolutely to raise a new mustache. Then after he had made fairly good headway with the hairs on his upper lip, he discovered to his consternation that he couldn't find his cut. What to do about it?

Toss Up

She—It was really a toss up this morning whether I played golf or went to church.

He—Really?

She—Yes, and I had to toss up 15 times before I got golf.

30-Day Duck Season

Thirty days of wild duck shooting from Monday, October 21, to Tuesday, November 19, is in prospect for Minnesota Hunters, according to regulations of the U. S. Bureau of Biological Survey adopted last week. Season's regulations are the "most drastic in the history of American wildfowl" including:

Shooting over baited water or land is prohibited. Use of live decoys at any time or place is banned. Shooting hours daily will be from 7 a. m. to 4 p. m.

Daily bag limit was reduced from 12 to 10 birds with possession limit of one day's bags.

Three-shell limit limit placed on automatic and repeating shotguns.

Nation divided into two zones for shooting purposes.

Included in the northern zone are the following states which will have uniform opening and closing dates with Minnesota: Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, Missouri, North and South Dakota, Nebraska and Montana.

"Although I have held out for an absolute closed season this year, the new regulations are a big improvement over those of the past few years," Erling Swenson, Director of the Division of Game and Fish, commented.

"The stopping of the baiting evil, banning of the use of live decoys, continous shooting each day rather than the staggered seasons of last year, and reduced bag and possession limits are commendable rulings to save our diminishing wild migratory waterfowl. It is hoped that the new regulations will save at least 50 per cent of the increase in wild ducks as planned."

Norman Peterson and Percy Sorter made a business trip to the Twin Cities last week. Mr. Peterson remained there for a few days.

Will Rogers-Wiley Post

The whole country was saddened last Friday morning when the daily papers came out with an Associated Press report that Will Rogers, cowboy philosopher, actor and air-travel enthusiast, and Wily Post, who circled the earth alone in a plane, were killed late Thursday night when their plane crashed fifteen miles south of Point Barrow, the northermost point of Alaska. The two men were on a vacation jaunt and had just alighted on a small river to ask the native Eskimos for direction to Point Barrow as the fog was too heavy to see where they were going. The plane crashed as the motor died when they had raised only fifty feet off the water as they were taking off again for their destination.

The plane was wrecked but the bodies were recovered by parties from Point Barrow and returned to the United States for burial. According to reports the men were instantly killed when the heavy motor of the ship crushed them in the cabin as the plane crashed into the ice strewn river and sank in several feet of water.

Rain Delays Harvest

Harvesting and haying have been at a stand still here most of the time since last Friday afternoon due to heavy rains. The first heavy rain storm hit here late Friday afternoon and evening when more rain came down than there has at any time during the whole summer. Several low spots are now filled with water and it will be some time before those who have crops in the burn-outs in the lake region out east will be able to cut their hay and grain.

First Threshing Done Here

The first threshing machine to hum in this community this fall, went into action at the Wm. Paskewitz farm the middle of last week when W. C. Paskewitz threshed out some crop for his father. They stated that the barley ran twenty-five bushels to the acre on their fields.

Share-the-Wealth Measure Is Passed by the House

Sen. Barbour

VIOLENTLY attacked from all sides and nowhere defended with enthusiasm, the President's new share-the-wealth tax bill nevertheless was put through the house because of the great administration majority and also because the congressmen are tired out and eager to go home. Representative Treadway, Republican, of Massachusetts, made a last effort against the measure with a resolution to send it back to committee, but this was easily defeated.

As passed by the house, the bill is not quite what the President asked for. Briefly summarized, it increases taxes on individual incomes over $50,000, substitutes a graduated corporation-income tax for the present flat levy, puts new taxes on inheritances and gifts in addition to those already borne by estates and gifts, imposes new taxes of 5 to 20 per cent on "excess" profits of corporations.

It is designed to raise revenue estimated at between $250,000,000 and $270,000,000. Its warmest friends couldn't explain how this would do much in the way of bringing about what the President calls "wider distribution of wealth," or in the way of balancing the budget.

The measure was handed on to the senate with dubious prospects. It was expected the senate finance committee would study it for about a week, and in the meanwhile the conservative Republicans and not a few Democrats were preparing to fight it. Senator W. W. Barbour of New Jersey, Republican, fired an opening gun with a statement in which he said: "Votes, and votes alone, are the objective of this half-baked measure."

Declaring the bill "has no relation to making income meet outgo, but is intended to accomplish some weird social objective," Barbour continued:

"What this bill actually attempts is to climb upon that hard-ridden steed, 'Share-the-Wealth,' and ride him away while the demagogues who have pressed him sorely in the past are looking in the other direction.

"The bill should be laid away until the next session of congress when the budget for the ensuing year will be presented. Then, in the light of carefully appropriated federal moneys, we can determine how much revenue will be needed to operate.

"Taxes can be levied deliberately as a true revenue measure. Any other program is not good business and is not good government."

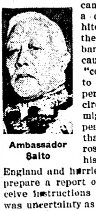
One change made by the house against the President's wishes involved corporations' gifts to charities. Mr. Roosevelt was firmly against letting corporations deduct from their taxable income any gifts to charity. Just as firmly the house voted to let them deduct up to 5 per cent of their incomes.

O'Mahoney Has a Scheme to Revive Objectives of NRA

NOT to be dismayed by the death of NRA, Senator J. C. O'Mahoney of Wyoming thinks the objectives of that contraption, high labor standards and fair competition, can be realized, and for that purpose he has drawn up a measure for the regulation of all national commerce by licensing business.

The senator, who is a lawyer, carefully avoided the phrase "interstate commerce." He proposed to define "commerce among the states" in the language of the leading decisions of the Supreme court.

Japanese Emperor "Insulted" By an American Caricature



Ambassador Saito

JAPANESE consider their emperor a sacred personage, and consequently there was deep resentment in the island empire when Vanity Fair, an American magazine, printed a caricature of Hirohito. That issue of the magazine was banned in Japan because the picture was "considered insulting to the Japanese imperial house and if circulated in Japan might disturb public peace." More than that, Ambassador Hirosi Saito interrupted his vacation in New England and hurried to Washington to prepare a report on the affair and receive instructions from Tokyo. There was uncertainty as to whether he would make a formal protest or merely take up the matter directly with the magazine's editors.

One State department spokesman said Japanese officials realized that the American government had no control over the press, but cable dispatches said Japanese newspapers criticized their embassy here for alleged failure to see that "such indignities" were not published.

The dispatches also reported that the Japanese home and foreign office officials characterized the caricature as "terrible." It showed the emperor pulling an old-fashioned jinriksha in which reposed the Nobel peace prize.

Frank Crowninshield, editor of Vanity Fair, said this caricature, like the many others run in the magazine, was meant to be merely jocose.

Huge Sum Is Allotted for American Business Census

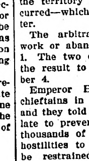
NEARLY $8,000,000—$7,784,000, to be exact—has been allotted from the work relief funds by President Roosevelt for a census of American business. The census bureau asked and received this after it had been allotted $293,000 for a survey of retail trade. The business work is to begin at once, and the canvass will start on January 2. According to the official announcement, it will cover "all business activities with the exception of agriculture and manufacturing industries, and will furnish information of importance to the federal government, to business and to labor." The headquarters will be in Philadelphia.

The aim of the census, the officials said, "is to secure basic information relating to the number of operating units, employment, pay rolls, receipts and other business data for all business enterprises."

Necessarily, the census will give temporary employment to a large number of canvassers.

Rexford G. Tugwell, head of the resettlement administration, asked for a second allotment to develop unproductive land withdrawn from cultivation. He wanted $10,381,310 for eight tracts in seven states, and estimated that their development as hunting, fishing and camping preserves would provide 6,731 jobs lasting from 15 to 23 days. These projects are in Illinois, Indiana, Minnesota, Mississippi, New York, Georgia and Connecticut.

League Delays Settlement of Italo-Ethiopian Quarrel



Anthony Eden

CAPT. ANTHONY EDEN, British minister for League of Nations affairs, was exceedingly busy in Geneva trying to find a way to avert war between Italy and Ethiopia. He was aided and abetted by Premier Laval of France and together they evolved a plan for procedure by the league council which appeared promising, until it was communicated to Premier Mussolini. Then Baron Aloisi, Italian delegate, announced the Eden-Laval formula was "entirely unacceptable." However, hope was not abandoned for there was a chance that modifications could be made that would satisfy the demands of the Italians.

The league council finally, in a brief public session, set aside Ethiopia's demand for immediate action and agreed to undertake a general examination of the whole matter a month hence. It provided for resumption of arbitration of the clash at Ualual, stipulating that the arbitrators should not attempt to pass on the ownership of the territory on which the clash occurred—which is the root of the matter.

The arbitrators must finish their work or abandon it before September 1. The two disputants are to report the result to the council by September 4.

Emperor Haile Selassie met his chieftains in council at Addis Ababa and they told him it might be now too late to prevent war for their tens of thousands of fighters were eager for hostilities to begin and could hardly be restrained. The emperor, however, sought to hold the chiefs back

British Parliament Gives India a New Government

GREATER freedom for the 350,000,000 inhabitants of India under a new form of government is provided by the India bill finally enacted by the British parliament and approved by the king. The measure was the bulkiest ever passed by parliament, and its preparation took eight years.

The law sets up an all-India federated parliament, linked with eleven British Indian states with their own subordinate legislatures and such native states as decide to come in. It separates Burma and Assam from India and gives them also a large measure of self-government.

Pensions of Spanish War Veterans Are Now Restored

PASSAGE of the bill to restore $46,000,000 of Spanish war veterans' pensions was completed when the senate accepted the house measure, the only opposing vote being cast by Senator Hastings of Delaware. This nullifies the various adjustments made by the President for the purpose of economy to carry out the party pledge of a reduction of at least 25 per cent in the cost of administration of the federal government.

Germany Asks Punishment of Attackers on the Bremen

GERMANY'S diplomatic note concerning the Communist attack on the liner Bremen in the port of New York took the form of a request that the offenders be punished but asked for no apology. Acting Secretary of State William Phillips, in his reply handed to the German charge d'Affaires, Dr. Rudolf Leitner, told briefly the efforts of the New York police to guard the vessel and to subdue the mob, and pointed out that some of those who took part in the attack were arrested. The German note said the incident constituted an insult to Germany.

In his press conference President Roosevelt declined to comment on the affair. Asked about the protest of Jewish organizations against the German government's religious attitude, the President intimated that the administration's view was fully expressed by Mr. Phillips' reply in which he expressed sympathy for anyone who was denied religious liberty.

Goebbels Insists on War on All "Enemies" of Nazidom

Paul Goebbels

NOTWITHSTANDING warnings by Dr. Hjalmar Schacht and other sane Germans, some of the Nazi leaders insist on pushing to further extremes the war on Jews and Catholics. For instance, Paul Joseph Goebbels, minister of propaganda, in a speech at Essen announced drastic action against all "enemies" of the Nazi state—Jews, Catholics, the foreign press and the Stalheim war veterans. He predicted these important developments:

1. Suppression of the Catholic press and intensification of the Nazi campaign against all Catholic opponents of the third reich.

2. Nationwide dissolution of the Stahlheim.

3. An official ban in near future on marriages between Jews and Aryans.

Goebbels linked closely the foreign press and the Jews.

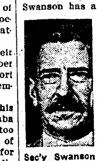
"We have suffered the arrogance of the Jews with the patience of a sheep during the last two years," he said. "That the foreign press take up the defense of the Jews proves merely Judah's internationalism."

Death of Frederick Gillette, Former Speaker of the House

FREDERICK H. GILLETT, who represented Massachusetts in the house for many years, for six years was speaker, and thereafter served as United States senator, died in Springfield, Mass., at the age of eighty-three. Able, dignified and unfailingly courteous, Mr. Gillett was highly esteemed by his fellow congressmen, whatever their party affiliation. In his home town he was known as a politician who said little and did much.

Frank H. Hitchcock, publisher of the Daily Citizen of Tucson, Ariz., succumbed to pneumonia after several months of ill health. Prominent in Republican party politics all his mature life, Mr. Hitchcock managed Taft's Presidential campaign in 1908 both before and after the convention and was postmaster general in the Taft cabinet. For years he was actively interested in the progress of aviation.

Secretary Swanson Tells Plans for New Naval Bases



Sec'y Swanson

JAPAN will probably have another cause for complaint against the United States. Secretary of the Navy Swanson has announced that strongly fortified naval bases will be established in the Pacific ocean upon the expiration of the naval limitation treaties on January 1, 1937. He said he considered the creation of naval stepping stones in the Pacific an inevitable result of the treaties' expiration. He revealed that the navy long has given consideration to Pacific fortification problems and that impetus had been given to the study since Japan's abrogation of the naval treaties.

The necessity for adequate bases in the Pacific was demonstrated forcibly last May during the annual fleet maneuvers off Hawaii and the Aleutian islands. According to reports, the navy high command in a report of the lessons learned in the exercises strongly recommended an Aleutian islands base.

The United States naval bases are few and far between as against those of Japan and Great Britain, which lie along the principal courses of English and Japanese traffic lines.

Law Is Enacted That Insures Promotion for Many Officers

CONGRESS has passed and the President has signed a bill which assures promotion in the near future for about 5,000 army officers. It accelerates the advancement of commissioned officers below the grade of colonel and takes effect September 1.

The act increases the number of colonels by 158, the number of lieutenant colonels by 364, and the number of majors by 890. More than 1,000 second lieutenants will be advanced immediately to the rank of first lieutenant and 1,769 first lieutenants will become captains. In all, 4,918 officers will receive immediate promotion.

Housewife's Idea Box

Relief for a Burn

If you or one of the youngsters gets a light burn and you have no efficient remedy at hand, try this: Scrape a raw potato and make a poultice of it. This usually gives immediate relief. If not, continue applying the potato poultices. As soon as one gets hot and dry, replace it with a fresh one.

SYNOPSIS

Following his father's bitter criticism of his idle life, and the withdrawal of financial assistance, Hal Ireland, only son of a wealthy banker, finds himself practically without funds but with the promise of a situation in San Francisco, which city he must reach, from New York, within a definite time limit. He takes passage with a cross-country auto party on a "share expense" basis. With five other members of the party, an attractive girl, Barry Trafford; middle-aged Giles Kerrigan; Sister Anastasia, a nun; and an individual whom he instinctively dislikes, Martin Crack, he starts his journey. Barry's reticence annoys him. To Kerrigan he takes at once, but he is unable to shake off a feeling of uneasiness.

He followed Hal into the lunchroom with the embarrassed friendliness of a whipped hound. Relief didn't at once come to the atmosphere with Hal's entrance. Crack's narrow look at Hal's face was uncertain, though one hand indolently jostled the golf-ball. And Barry—Hal laughed at himself for having forgotten that this thing was to be used against her; and he barely kept himself from looking at her, showing her his sincere, forgetful anger. He smiled amiably at Mrs. Pulsipher, saying "What? not started eating yet?" "No," she said, as if weariness had come to her in the short time he'd been gone: "I—we were wondering—" Her look went in timorous question to Miller, then back to Hal. "We were just—just waiting for you," she said.

"I wish you hadn't," said Hal gently. "Miller and I've just been arranging a sort of transfer: he's taking my place and I'm taking his." He added, "I've got the fares."

He saw Mrs. Pulsipher believe and recover. The nun's head was up and her gentle eyes on Hal's in something like proud gratitude, as if he had foreseen and spared her humiliation. Pulsipher gave a series of quick, single coughs, looked pleased and hopeful again; and Crack leaned away from the counter, his close-set eyes basking on Hal's in their own speculative laziness. Hal turned his back on Barry, wondering why the devil he had to start trembling, now it was all over. He prayed he would stop it before Barry noticed it: he felt her watching him.

Kerrigan came to his side as the others moved back toward the tables. "He tried it, 'ey?" His tone was judicial, but his brown eyes above the tough, florid cheeks were nimble with some special laughter.

Hal looked at him, frankly and humorously quizzical. "Yes, the louse," he said. "What's the joke?"

"I was wondering how long you'd keep from looking at her," Kerrigan said.

Hal gave a tight, sheepish smile and let his look answer Kerrigan's.

"Just wanted to gather myself a little and make the first one right," he said.

Kerrigan nodded brief commendation. "You've got old Spot-landing where he won't try this again?"

"Mm," said Hal, gathering up his change. "Got his money and his papers —and the keys. Got an idea about what we might do, too. Like to ask you later."

Without any definite demonstration, Kerrigan welcomed the "we." "Good," he said. "Hungry?"

"Yes," said Hal, remembering that he was. "You?"

"Yes."

Every one, including Miller, was seated at one of the big, white-enamel tables when they started back.

"Gathered yourself?" Kerrigan said without looking at him.

"Guess so," said Hal, smiling a little.

"Go, sit beside her, then," said Kerrigan.

"Right," said Hal.

He pulled out the empty chair beside Barry—in next the wall. "D'you mind if I sit here?" he said, as lightly formal as he could manage.

She looked around at him without hurry, the parting of her lips delayed again till after the first smiling of her blue, yellow-flecked eyes. "No," she said in near-husky ease.

"Thank you," said Hal, still casual.

"I—I'd like to thank you," she said quietly.

"For what?"

"What you've just done."

"Please don't," he said.

"Why not?" she said.

He turned to her, his look bland—to deny understanding of whatever significance her eyes might show him. But there was no special significance, only deliberate interest, as if she really wanted to know why not. And he had a new idea, exciting for its simplicity. He watched her an instant longer, then let ingenuous smiling dissolve all his formality.

"I'll tell you exactly why," he said, leaning a little forward. "Because I didn't think Miller had the wit to try what he did. Because I should have stood there like a wooden Indian and let him get away with it if you hadn't looked at me the way you did. There. But I ask you please not to look at me that way any more if you can help it, because it's rotten for my temper."

Her lips parted further over bright teeth, and there was nothing of defense left in her look. And after he had involuntarily felt the compliment in her candid pleasure, he realized how beautifully that leisured light behind her eyes—free of coquetry, traced with reticent interest—suited the soft, clear composure of her face.

"That's all darned honest of you," she said.

"Aren't you used to it—honesty?" said Hal.

She dropped her eyes, closed her lips, but she was still smiling when she looked up again. There was nothing conscious or dramatic about her saying, "No—not especially. But that doesn't stop my liking it."

"I'm glad," he said. "That makes it easy to be honest again. Honesty is my curse—one of them."

Her smile, and the light behind it, slowly disappeared. She watched him a moment, not thinking of what he'd said. "I like . . ." She began, and then the waitress' arm drove between them, her finger stabbing an item on the bill of fare that Barry held. "Cornbeef is deelicious; veal chops is out."

"Out where?" said Hal.

"Veal chops is finished," she said.

Barry moved the card so he could look at it, too, her eyes on it, but uninterested. Hal glanced up quickly —across and down the table. Crack wasn't watching them; but Hal knew he had been.

* * * * * * *

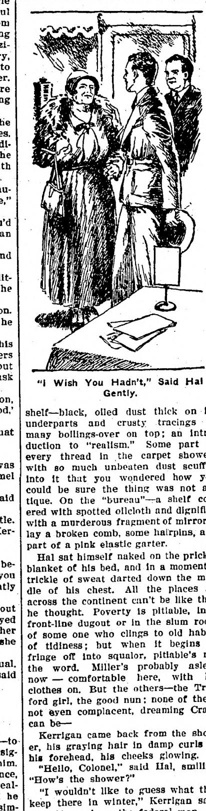
The hotel couldn't take them all, and Mrs. Pulsipher was certain it would be too dear any way; but down the road a little they found cabins; the 75c sign convinced Mrs. Pulsipher and the sign "Showers" convinced Hal. Pairing the party was easy: the Pulsiphers for one cabin, Barry and Sister Anastasia for another, then Hal and Kerrigan, with Miller left for Crack. Miller started for his bed at once, peeling his coat awkwardly as he went.

"Miller!" Hal called after him. The man turned, grinning sleepy cleverness which Hal hoped was merely his continued attempt at ingratiation. "Bags," Hal said.

"Ain't gonna need 'em jus' for the one night," he said. "I don't need mine."

"Get 'em out," said Hal; and Miller went about it, still grinning.

As he undressed, Hal inspected the night shelter with quiet awe. The three-burner kerosene stove on the stained shelf—black, oiled dust thick on its underparts and crusty tracings of many boilings-over on top; an introduction to "realism." Some part of every thread in the carpet showed, with so much unbeaten dust scuffed into it that you wondered how you could be sure the thing was not antique. On the "bureau"—a shelf covered with spotted oilcloth and dignified with a murderous fragment of mirror—lay a broken comb, some hairpins, and part of a pink elastic garter.



"I Wish You Hadn't," Said Hal Gently.

Hal sat himself naked on the prickly blanket of his bed, and in a moment a trickle of sweat darted down the middle of his chest. All the places all across the continent can't be like this, he thought. Poverty is pitiable, in a front-line dugout or in the slum room of some one who clings to old habits of tidiness; but when it begins to fringe off into squalor, pitiable's not the word. Miller's probably asleep now — comfortable here, with his clothes on. But the others—the Trafford girl, the good nun; none of them, not even complacent, dreaming Crack can be—

Kerrigan came back from the shower, his graying hair in damp curls on his forehead, his cheeks glowing.

"Hello, Colonel," said Hal, smiling. "How's the shower?"

"I wouldn't like to guess what they keep there in winter," Kerrigan said, "but if you hear the federal men, it's easy to bail out. The door into the front store swings open whenever you happen to think. Crack's in there now, but he said he'd send up a rocket when he was finished." He dug a freshly laundered suit of blue-and-white striped pajamas out of his bag and tossed them to the bed. Hal looked at them gratefully, their freshness like a small pool in the baking wooden room.

"What was your thought about what next?" Kerrigan asked.

"Oh," said Hal. "Something like this. I shouldn't think any of 'em would be disappointed if we dropped Miller and his car. I know a fella in a company in Detroit—know him well enough to ask him a favor. What would you think if I got him to put us on to a good second-hand car and trust us for the price till we get it to the Coast and sell it? If Miller was going to make a profit on the fares, we ought to be able to break even anyway. And if he can find the way, we can. What d'you think?"

"The scheme of a genius, a titan," Kerrigan rumbled, taking cigarettes from his coat.

"We can try it," said Hal. "Only, look—if we could tell the others—not tell them that it's through a friend of mine we're getting the car: if we could say you and I were chipping in on a bargain and expected a profit on the Coast."

Kerrigan's eyes were friendly with approval. "You mean the are-you-any-relation-to-Frederick-Ireland sitchation?" he said.

Hal nodded.

Then a shadow fell on Kerrigan's look and he turned his head dubiously toward the door, saying, "Hi there, nippers. Finished?"

The door was ajar and Crack's head was stuck around it. "Yes," said Crack, smiling with tentative amiability, as if he hoped to be asked in.

"Thank you very much," said Hal.

The door closed without sound; Hal and Kerrigan looked at each other, both listening.

After a moment Hal said in a subdued tone, "What does he carry that silly golf-ball for?"

Kerrigan shook his head. "Why do you suppose that oaf in New York picked on him to be with the Trafford gal?"

"Don't know," said Hal. "Except the only man I've seen this year stupider than Larsen is Miller."

There was a car at the gas pumps, and Hal in yellow slicker and red-leather slippers walked across the grass with the headlights full on him, feeling as if he were on the stage of the Hollywood Bowl. He found the Gents' place all that Kerrigan had said of it. But the water that fell on him from the shower was cool and pristine and good, like delicious rain. And as he reveled in it, he piously acknowledged the miracle that made so simple a thing as cool water a tonic for body, a wine for spirit, an essence of immaculate luxury.

The flow of his shower slackened as the sound of raining began in the next compartment, beyond the partition that didn't bother to reach the ceiling. He heard a short breath taken—of pleasure and eagerness; and then Barry's near-husky voice quietly sad, "Oh, d—n it."

Hal gave a single laugh of pleasure. "Can I help?" he said.

"Where are you?" she said.

"Next door. What's happened?"

"I walked into this b'—this so-and-so shower with my darned wrist-watch on."

"Ah, cry-making," said Hal. "Sorry."

"You don't sound it, but thanks just the same. Gosh, isn't it good—the water?"

"Beautiful," he said sincerely. "Beautiful. As beautiful as—as—"

"As cool water running over you after a hot day in an old car with seven people and a dog."

"Where's the dog?"

"Here—having his shower too. He loves showers."

Hal chuckled. "I'd like to see—I'd like—Well, yes."

"Good," said Barry; "I'm glad."

"Glad of what?"

"Glad you can't. I haven't—I'm not—"

"What! not at all?"

"Well, practically not," she said. "Just jodhpurs and an old bed-jacket."

"I suppose you'll be going in for comedy in Hollywood," Hal said.

"Who told you I was going to Hollywood?" she said, at once guarded.

"You did."

"I didn't."

"You didn't say it with your mouth, but everything else about you did," said Hal.

"Oh," she said coolly. "You're one of those people who knows lots and lots about other people just by looking at them."

"No," he said. "I'm mostly pretty unobservant."

For a moment she said nothing under the cool showering of water. Then curiously, "What's a snob?"

"What do you want—an epigram?"

"No, I want to know what you say a snob is."

"A snob," he said, thinking, "a snob is what envious people call some one who minds his own business and only cultivates people he likes."

"Who made that up?"

"I did."

Her tone wasn't flippant, merely interested: "To fit yourself?"

"N'ho," Hal laughed. "Why?"

"Just wondered. Sometimes today you were what I thought a snob might be. You weren't so darn nice to the Pulsiphers, and they were ready to be nice to you. You didn't let down for Kerrigan till you saw he wasn't going to run after you. And—"

"I wasn't asking anybody to run after me," said Hal. "I don't think I'd like it. And—what else?"

"And you made me mad."

"I'm sorry," he said happily. "But I was—I wasn't trying not to. You were making me mad, even before you looked at me there, where we had dinner."

"Ah? How?"

"Want it honest or pretty?"

"Whichever you like," she said carelessly.

"Guess which it is, then," said Hal. "I thought you were too sure of your looks—wondering all the time which of us you'd have to keep from getting fresh. That made me mad."

"Because you wanted me to be pleased and surprised when you told me about my looks? Because you didn't want it made hard to get fresh?"

Better Potatoes Scientists' Aim

New Varieties Now on Trial; Much Work Is Ahead for Experimenters.

By Prof. E. V. Hardenburg, New York State College of Agriculture.
WNU Service.

Very few new varieties of potatoes have been developed during the past forty years. This might seem to indicate that the public is satisfied with what we have. But it is not true. Varieties of potatoes are needed that will not turn black after cooking; that will resist such diseases as scab, leaf-roll, late blight, and yellow-dwarf; that will resist leaf hoppers, and that will better tolerate heat and drouth. Much as the potato breeder has done, his job has just begun.

For more than 20 years the United States Department of Agriculture has been developing thousands of potato seedlings at its breeding stations. Attention centers especially on improvement in the shape of the tuber, the color and the texture of the skin, shallowness of eyes, cooking quality, and resistance to virus diseases.

Three of the most promising varieties have been named and are now on trial with many growers in a few potato states. In order of their introduction, these varieties are: the Katahdin, a handsome, shallow-eyed glossy white-skinned potato; the Chippewa, promising early variety, white-skinned and shallow-eyed, that may compete with Irish Cobbler; and the Golden potato, medium in season, white-skinned, yellow-fleshed. Other seedlings will be named and introduced this year, but several years may pas before they become generally available.

Live Stock Losses Are Heavier in Summer Time

Two suggestions for reducing live stock shipping losses are advanced by C. W. Hammans, extension specialist in marketing for the Ohio State university.

He suggests the use of sand as a bedding material for truck and carlot shipments during the hot, summer months, and trucking to market at such times that the live stock will arrive during the early morning hours. The sand, well wet down, helps to avoid overheating and losses.

Shipping losses during a year are estimated to amount to as much as $30,000,000, Hammans says. Losses from death and crippling at four Ohio markets reached $162,000 during a season when accurate count was kept.

Greatest losses are with hogs. During summer months one hog in 200 is dead upon arrival at the stock yards. Of the $162,000 loss reported in the survey, $137,000 were in hogs. The remainder was the result of losses of cattle, sheep and calves.

Crossbreeding Animals

Crossbreeding is the mating of pure-bred animals of different breeds of the same species. Crossbred animals are usually larger and more vigorous than either parent. Their hereditary material, however, is so complex that there is no certainly as to what results will come from mating them. Except to produce market animals, crossbreeding should be used only by the highly skilled breeder, and it is not practicable in his case unless he has an opportunity to place the progeny on the market for breeding purposes. American practice in livestock breeding does not encourage the development of new breeds except in the case of pet stock. Therefore the practical man, as a rule, will leave this matter to the experimentalists.—Missouri Farmer.

Can Years of Happy Married Companionship Wipe Out the Memory of Early Love "Slip"?

"When I was away visiting my sister-in-law in another city recently I had occasion to see a rather unusual little play that opened there. It was called 'The Perfect Marriage,' and showed two people who had been married fifty years who were beloved by everybody and really believed themselves to be an example of a perfect marriage.

"Lovers over seventy, they were. And in reviewing the years they had spent together theirs seemed really to be an example of what all who start out on a honeymoon hope their marriage will be.

"And then, by one of those quirks of circumstances that take place in plays, like the one pulled stitch that starts to unravel a whole job of knitting, there is unraveled the story of an extra-marital 'affair' on the part of both. Both the husband and the wife of this perfect marriage once had a lover. Neither find out until now, after fifty years of 'ideal' marriage. When they do the revelation nearly upsets their sturdy little citadel of love—but not quite. With the philosophy of their years they forgive each other, and—live happily ever afterward.

"Now we hear a good deal in real life, too, of forgiveness of infidelity, and at a more hot-blooded age than that of the golden-wedding couple. Can you understand it? I pride myself on being modern, and all that, but I think this is a question of human values that does not change with the age. What do you say?"

Broadminded, and with the understanding of human nature that is her marked characteristic, the famous writer to whom this query was addressed thus answers it:

"I say this—the old saying: 'You can forgive—but not forget!' Though marriage may, indeed many marriages have survived discovery of infidelity on one or both sides, in my opinion there is always something killed. The fabric of marriage may be patched up, but the warp and woof and soul of the thing must surely carry the mark.

"On the other hand, to my mind, it is not at all beyond understanding, as my correspondent suggests, how such a couple, or either one, can be willing to 'take back' the unfaithful one, or make the effort to forgive.

"While I certainly do not minimize the hurt, the wrench, the impulse to the contrary that would naturally be involved in continuing to live with a husband or wife who has been discovered unfaithful, the richer and the happier the marriage has been the more possible it is to understand such a forgiveness. For a really true marriage is a house of many mansions. Beside the physical love there is the understanding, the companionship, with which, as I like to say, one never walks alone. In that companionship there is mutual suffering, mutual struggle, mutual joy—mutual understanding. With people of quality—the human, not the social kind—those are things to make life rich indeed. With such people, you may say, infidelity does not happen. And yet, it has been known to. And in such a case forgiveness, while a bitter enough cup —and while the drink can never be the same as when it was taken at the spring of untainted belief—is, nevertheless, understandable."

PREHISTORIC "FACTORY"

A site where prehistoric man played on the beach perhaps 100,000 years or more ago has been discovered by C. van Riet Lowe, the South African archeologist. Between great clumps of rock, which were evidently washed by the sea countless years ago, although now they stand half a mile inland, is a vast sand dune which has hardened with the passing of time. This dune has been scoured by rain water running down the hillside and is crumbling away, exposing valuable evidence of how man lived in the Stone age days. Mr. Van Riet Lowe picked up dozens of unfinished stone axes. He believes this was a factory site of prehistoric man. Here, apparently, he came to the beach for his waterworn stones, knocked them into some semblance of the shape he desired and discarded those which chipped badly. The site was littered with imperfect specimens of the stones.

How are your brakes? If you were to drive an unfamiliar car you would probably immediately ask about the condition of the brakes. Yet so often step into our own car knowing full well that the brakes are not up to standard and drive the car at an unusual speed.

Where standards have been set the results of an investigation are usually surprising. Often half of the vehicles will not be able to make a stop from 20 miles per hour in 37 feet. In this respect on this particular investigation the performance of trucks was usually much worse than that of private vehicles.

Grease on brake drums, delayed action on all barkes, and other causes were responsible for poor brake action.

Have your brakes checked regularly. They should be up to standard at all times. When an emergency arises you want to be prepared, and you cannot be prepared with poor brakes.

Congress Adjourned Tuesday

Congress adjourned a historic session of gigantic legislative labors on Tuesday, but left behind under a filibuster by Senator Huey Long democrat of Louisiana the money for major New Deal Problems. The Senate quit at midnight Monday and the house closed its first session of the 74th congress at 12:09 after having turned back the clock to see what course the Senate would pursue.

The past session as far as we can see has been devoted to a great extent in advertising Senator Long from Louisana and it sure is with high hopes from us that he will be nominated in 1936 and have the privelege to go back to the White house as the big papa to the little boys from the country.

Sportsmen Held Meeting

Approximately 100 sportsmen representing the seventh conservation district, comprising the northwestern corner of the state, met in the Civic and Commerce association rooms in the Auditorium at Thief River Falls on Tuesday evening last week and perfected an organization yet unnamed.

A. A. Trost of Warren was named first president of the group, while F. A. Brown of Grygla was elected vice president and Paul Lundgren, Thief River Falls, secretary-treasurer. Elected to the board of directors were Dr. N. M. Leitch, Warroad; Sam Vagle, Bronson; William Zauche, Baudette; Hans Olson, Viking; H. J. Enderle, Plummer; P. S. Saas, Crookston; and C. H. Jung of Thief River Falls. Dr. Edward Bratrud presided over the early part of the meeting as temporary chairman.

The meeting which had been called by Game Warden W. H. Quist, was thoroly representative of sportsmen in this section, delegations being present from Crookston, Warren, Red Lake Falls, Grygla, Plummer, Roseau, Warroad, Hallock, Badger and Holt.

It was decided to include in the membership of the association all members of affiliating groups such as local sportsmen's clubs, and Legion Posts, the details to be worked out by the board of directors. A collection was taken up to care for incidental expenses, the Grygla Sportsmen's club contributing $5 to the fund.

The association instructed its officers to draw up resolutions condemning the action of the federal bureau of biological survey and the state department of conservation in setting the opening of the duck season in this section as late as October 21, it being pointed out that by that date the lakes along the northern border of the state are frequently frozen over.

Another resolution called on state authorities to establish a five day deer hunting season in northern Minnesota, speakers from various communities stating that deer are more plentiful this year than in a number of years.

Mr. and Mrs. Ben Maijala and children, Mr. and Mrs. Christ Engen and Mrs. Harry Engen and children visited at the A. Hammersten home at Highlanding on Sunday.

Patrol Enforce Speed Laws

The state highway patrol, which for years was prohibited by law from making arrests for speeding, has joined forces with other safety agencies in an effort to reduce dangerous speed on the highways.

N. W. Elsberg, highway commissioner, announced today that after a study of legal points involved, he has ordered the patrol to treat excessive speed in the same manner as other traffic law violations'

John P. Arnoldy, chief of the patrol, is working out detailed plans for his men to follow in combatting the speeders who menace other traffic upon the trunk system.

The state legislature of 1929, in creating the highway patrol, expressly prohibited the patrol from enforcing speed laws. Succeeding legislatures followed the same policy. This year, however, when the legislature gave added police powers to the patrol, it ommited from the law the words which previously protected the speeders.

"The way is open for the patrol to prosecute speeders, and we have determined to exercise that authority", Chief Arnoldy said. "Modern motor cars are capable of such tremendous speeds that greater regulation is imparative to reduce the traffic killings on our public highways."

On the open highway, outside of built up sections, school zones and other special situations, the state law provides that any speed over 45 miles an hour constitutes prima facie evidence of driving faster than is reasonable. That is, a person arrested for speeding on the open road, if going faster than 45 miles an hour, would have to prove to the court that his speed was reasonable and not endangering other users of the highway.

"We are not going to set 45 miles an hour as a speed limit", said Mr. Arnoldy. "The patrolmen will be instructed to exercise their judgement and make arrests for high speeds in accordance with traffic conditions and other surrounding circumstances".

A conviction for speeding will make the motorist liable to imprisonment for up to 90 days, or to a fine of up to $100.

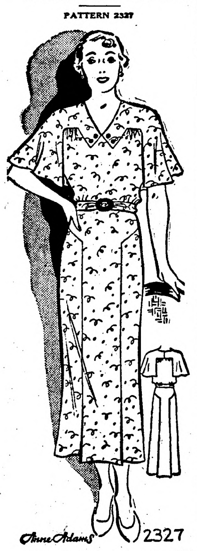
PATTERN 2327



Ordinarily it is much more difficult for the heavier figure to present the same graciously feminine appearance as her slim sister achieves! But not when our stylist sets out to design a thoroughly feminine but neatly tailored afternoon frock! Witness the result. First see how trim the neck and skirt details are. Then, how simply feminine softness is gathered into the yoke. Now note the extremely simple cut of the yoke and cape and the graceful, flattering fall of the cape itself. Senators Back Down on "Soaking" Small Incomes

Senator Borah

NOBODY liked the new tax bill that congress was working on, and the senate finance committee had hard work making up its mind as to the form it would recommend. First it altered almost every provision of the bill passed by the house and changed it from a "soak the rich" measure to one which would soak practically every one. This was done by lowering personal income tax exemptions and starting the surtax increases at $3,000 instead of $50,000. The latter feature was proposed by Senator La Follette and was adopted to keep him in line. Also, the inheritance taxes which President Roosevelt had asked for were eliminated.

Protests against increasing the taxes on little incomes came immediately, from senators, representatives and the country at large. Senators Borah of Idaho and Norris of Nebraska were among the "independents" who expressed their disapproval. Mr. Borah especially was vocal in opposition. He could not see the justice or the wisdom of the proposition.

"Families with these small incomes are now paying more than their proportionate share of taxes and at the same time are facing higher prices for food, clothes, fuel and rents," he said.

So the committee suddenly reversed itself abruptly, rejected the La Follette plan by a vote of 8 to 7, and for the time being at least saved the little incomes and perhaps a lot of house members who hope to be re-elected.

The bill which the committee voted to report contains new provisions to compensate for those eliminated from the house bill and the estimated revenue is only $1,000,000 less. This is divided in the senate bill as follows:

Graduated corporation income tax	$ 60,000,000
Corporation excess profits and capital stock taxes	65,000,000
Intercorporate dividend taxes	39,000,000
Increased estate taxes with related gift taxes	100,000,000
Increased surtaxes on incomes in excess of $1,000,000	5,000,000
Total	$269,000,000

The bill thus more closely follows the demands of President Roosevelt than the house measure, with the exception of inheritance taxes, which the senate committee eliminated. Even this action was offset by the increase in the existing estate and gift tax rates, expected to bring in $100,000,000.

This action by the senate committee probably means the adjournment of congress will be speeded up. The house is cleaning up its "must" legislation, the ways and means committee having voted to report favorably the Guffey coal bill which would set up a "little NRA" for the bituminous industry. It is generally believed this measure will not stand a test in the Supreme court, but the administration had demanded its enactment nevertheless.

How Social Security Pension System Works

WHEN the President's social security bill was finally enacted into law, the senate adopting the conference report already agreed to by the house, probably many thousands of men and women all over the country began figuring on the pensions they would receive under its terms. It is unlikely that one in a thousand has any clear idea of how the new program's pension system will work, so we reprint here a neat summary prepared by the Associated Press showing its operation as applied to "Bill Jones":

"Suppose young Bill is twenty when the law goes into effect and makes an average monthly salary of $100 until he is sixty-five. He will get a monthly pension, until his death, of $53.75.

"In detail, here is what will happen to him:

"In the calendar years 1937, 1938, and 1939 he will pay a salary tax of 1 per cent, or a total of $36 for the three years. In 1940, 1941, 1942 he will pay 1½ per cent, or $54. In 1943, 1944, and 1945 the tax will be 2 per cent, or $72. In 1946, 1947, and 1948 the tax will be 2½ per cent, or $90. From 1949 to 1981, inclusive, the tax will be 3 per cent, or a total of $1,188 for those 33 years.

"Thus, in 45 years, Bill Jones will have paid in $1,440. All the time his employer will have been matching his tax payments, so the total paid to the federal treasury will be $2,880.

"At sixty-five Bill Jones can expect to live perhaps 10 years more. If he does, he will get back $6,450.

"When Bill Jones dies this is what will happen:

"His average annual salary will be multiplied by the number of years he paid taxes. In other words, if he dies after he has paid taxes for 45 years, $1,200 will be multiplied by 45—giving a total of $54,000. Arbitrarily, the bill stipulates that Bill Jones' estate shall be entitled to 3½ per cent of that, or $1,890—less any amount he received in pensions before he died.

"If Jones dies before he gets back $1,890 in pensions, what he actually received is deducted from $1,890 and the remainder paid to his heirs. If he lives until he gets back all of the $1,890 and more, his heirs get nothing.

"If Jones should die before he reaches sixty-five, his heirs would be entitled to a payment of 3½ per cent of the total wages on which taxes had been paid.

"For instance, if he died after ten years, he would have paid taxes on $12,000. His heirs would be entitled to 3½ per cent of that, or $420."

Senator Clark of Missouri made a brave attempt to save private pension systems, but gave up when the promise was made that house and senate committees will try during the recess to work out a method of preserving such of these as are found worthy. The measure as passed provides for old age security; unemployment insurance, and for financial aid to dependent children, the blind, the crippled, and to public health agencies. It carries appropriations totaling $94,491,000 for the fiscal year 1936 as the government's share of the program. This sum does not include an authorized grant of $4,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and $49,000,000 for each subsequent fiscal year to defray the cost of administering one project in the bill.

Farmers Organize Council to Protect Their Rights

FARMERS who believe that their individual rights are being encroached upon by the administration's agricultural policies are offered a chance to get together by the organization and incorporation in Chicago of the Farmers' Independent Council of America. Dan D. Casement, a farmer of Manhattan, Kan., is president of the body. Stanley F. Morse, South Caroline farmer and consulting agriculturist, is executive vice president and Chris J. Abbott, Nebraska stockman and farmer, and Clyde O. Patterson, Illinois Jersey breeder, were incorporators. Dr. Charles W. Burkett, agricultural authority of New York and formerly director of the Kansas agricultural experiment station, and L. G. Tolles, farmer and past master of the Connecticut State Grange, are other vice presidents of the council, and Dr. E. V. Wilcox, representative of the Country Gentleman, District of Columbia, is secretary-treasurer; Fred L. Crawford, Michigan congressman and farm owner; E. E. Dorsett, farmer and past master Pennsylvania State Grange, and Kurt Greenwald, farm manager and agricultural engineer, New York, are directors.

"To me there is but one issue, whether we are going to have a constitutional government or have a dictatorial regime," said Charles E. Collins, Colorado cattleman and president of the American National Live Stock association, regional vice president of the new organization.

G. O. P. Defeats New Dealers in Rhode Island Election

REPUBLICAN leaders throughout the country were immensely heartened—probably too much so—by the result of the by-election in the First district of Rhode Island. Charles F. Risk, Republican, and determined opponent of the New Deal, defeated Antonio Prince, Democrat, by nearly 13,000 votes, capturing the seat in congress which Francis B. Condon, Democrat, resigned to go on the State Supreme court. The reversal was so decisive that the Republicans hailed it as a clear indication that President Roosevelt would be defeated for re-election.

Chas. F. Risk

Representative B. H. Snell of New York, minority leader, made a speech about it in the house in which he said: "This is the first time the people of any part of the country have had an opportunity to pass on the reckless and extravagant expenditures of the administration. They have passed upon it in a very decisive manner. The election shows the people are beginning to think. The handwriting is on the wall. From now on we will witness similar rejections by the citizenry of the New Deal program."

Hoover Demands Showdown From the Administration

FORMER PRESIDENT HERBERT HOOVER, traveling from California to New York, stopped in Chicago long enough to issue a challenge to the Roosevelt administration and a call on the President for a showdown as to his policy on changing the Constitution. He declared the American people have a right to know what alterations in the basic law the administration proposes to make.

"The time has come," he said, "when these full purposes should be disclosed. The people should now be told openly the specific words of the exact amendment that these gentlemen want so that the people can consider and themselves determine it. That is their right."

Grass Roots Movement Is Given Permanent Form

REPUBLICANS of the 10 Midwestern states that participated in the Grass Roots conference in Springfield, Ill., have made the Grass Roots' movement a permanent auxiliary of the party. Harrison E. Spengler of Iowa is its chairman, Mrs. Leslie Wheeler of Illinois the vice chairman, and Jo Ferguson of Oklahoma, the secretary. Michigan, Ohio and Kentucky, not represented at the Springfield meeting, have been invited to join in the movement.

Black's Methods in Probe Resented by Pat Hurley

P. J. Hurley

SENATOR HUGO BLACK of Alabama may bring out a lot of facts in his inquiry into lobbying, but his way of conducting the investigation is not winning him any credit. The house has all along felt that he was trying to bully it into accepting the utilities bill "death sentence" clause and has been correspondingly resentful. Various witnesses before the senate committee have felt, seemingly with reason, that they were being treated unfairly.

One of these witnesses who complained bitterly was Patrick J. Hurley, secretary of war in the Hoover administration. He testified that he had received $100,000 from the Associated Gas and Electric system in the last three years, but insisted he was paid for legal advice only and had done no lobbying. Hurley was not permitted to read a prepared statement, and Black's interjections and questions so angered the witness that he rose to his feet and shouted: "Everyone knows all you gentlemen are good prosecutors! Of course, you don't know what it is to be fair or just. You try to put words into a witness' mouth. Your questions are all on the type of the 'Why don't you stop beating your wife?' query."

Federal Penal Colony on Rat Islands Proposed

COL. C. A. SEOANE of the army signal corps has proposed a plan for the establishment of a federal penal colony on the Rat islands, off Alaska, and recommended it to the consideration of Attorney General Cummings. It would be so isolated that no guards would be required and the prisoners could be left to shift for themselves.

The four Rat islands, near the end of the Aleutian group, comprise 1,000 square miles—and are more than 1,000 miles from the Alaskan mainland, 2,000 miles from the nearest United States point, and more than 2,000 miles from Hawaii. Except for one or two fox ranches on each, they are uninhabited.

Banishment to the Rat islands "would mean a long good-by without hope of pardon, parole, or escape," Colonel Seoane said. "Therein lies the secret of what is believed would become an effective damper on the crime wave of today."

The islands, part of the public domain, are suitable for raising blue foxes, sheep, and goats, and for fishing. They are washed by the warm Japan current, seldom have snow and have an average temperature of 89 in winter and 54 in summer.

Nazi "Housecleaning" Has Hitler's Full Support

ADOLF HITLER'S silence during the recently renewed Nazi warfare on Jews and Catholics led many to think the movement was being led by others. But Der Fuehrer emerged from his country residence to make a speech at Rosenheim in which he made it clear he was backing the current "housecleaning" to the limit. He declared the Nazi party would smash its opponents, continuing:

Adolf Hitler

"Always stand to your flag, not only in good days but even more in the bad ones. Keep it up when the storm lashes and clouds the firmament."

Deep apprehension still prevails among Jews in Germany as to what the future has in store for them. After Count von Helldorf, Berlin police president, had forbidden individual action against Jews, Wilhelm Frick, minister of interior, announced:

"The Jewish question will slowly but surely be gotten rid of, as the Nazi program foresees."

Mussolini and Ethiopian Emperor Prepare for War

ENGLAND and France were still trying to find the way to avert war between Italy and Ethiopia, but Premier Mussolini of Italy was so skeptical that he ordered 75,000 more men to the colors. By the first of October he will have about a million men in uniform. Haile Selassie, the Ethiopian emperor, was reported to have sanctioned the concentration of 60,000 of his troops on Italy's east African frontiers. The chiefs, it is said, are finding it increasingly difficult to restrain their warriors from overt acts that would surely precipitate warfare.

A report from Addis Ababa said the emperor was ready to cede a portion of Ethiopia to Italy in return for loans from that country to develop Ethiopia's resources and the granting of a seaport, as was suggested some time ago by Capt. Anthony Eden of England

DIETARY HABITS NEED FOSTERING EARLY IN CHILD

Nothing is quite so important to health as food. The wellbeing of a child depends on it, and his future stamina will reflect nutritive discrepancies in babyhood.

The mother who thinks that there is time enough ahead for corrective diet is laboring under a traditional delusion that up until two years of age and sometimes longer, milk is the sum total of everything.

Milk is the warp and the woof of what it takes to get through life, and especially at its beginning. But it needs supplementing, because its chemistry is low in a few needed essentials and the child, set in his all-milk diet, resists other foods.

Doctors Prescribe Varied Foods.

Doctors long ago recognized the value of adding other foods to the diet of milk, early in babyhood, in order to offset future finicky appetites. Thus the infant of six weeks gets his cod-liver oil and orange juice or tomato juice; a little later a spoonful or two of prepared vegetable juice or even the strained vegetable itself. At a period that in the past would have been considered murderous he gets his bit of cereal, part of the yolk of an egg, a snack of baked potato and mashed stewed fruit.

Whatever today's baby is given, should, of course, be absolutely under the doctor's direction. There is a difference in babies.

But the great truth that many mothers do not know is that children with touchy appetites at six or eight or ten years of age, are the results of fixed preference in babyhood.

Caution Must Be Exercised.

Another thing that should be remembered is that as milk must be the alpha and omega of his meal, therefore the amounts of other food given must not be so great that the willingness to take milk is decreased.

The doctor will give you lists and schedules for feeding. My suggestions here are only for one purpose. That is to show "why" and "how" aversions to needed foods are started. Food habits, which mean flavor habits, have to be cultivated early.

SYNOPSIS

Following his father's bitter criticism of his idle life, and the withdrawal of financial assistance, Hal Ireland, only son of a wealthy banker, finds himself practically without funds but with the promise of a situation in San Francisco, which city he must reach, from New York, within a definite time limit. He takes passage with a cross-country auto party on a "share expense" basis. With five other members of the party, an attractive girl, Barry Trafford; middle-aged Giles Kerrigan; Sister Anastasia, a nun; and an individual whom he instinctively dislikes, Martin Crack, he starts his journey. Barry's reticence annoys him. To Kerrigan he takes at once, but he is unable to shake off a feeling of uneasiness. He distrusts Crack, although finding his intimacy with Kerrigan ripening, and he makes a little progress with Barry.

"Then I wasn't wrong. We can start all over again."

"All over," she said. Her shower stopped and Hal's came more strongly. Then she made a squeak of horror.

"What now? Bed-jacket wet?"

"No, but I've got a chill and no towel. Gosh! What would Lubitsch do?"

"Keep the chill," said Hal, "you'll need it. I'll toss you a towel over the top."

He reached the harsh, gray towel Kerrigan had got for him and swung an end of it into her compartment. "Got it?"

"Oh, thanks," she said, "a lot."

"You'll remember this and not be boompsish with me tomorrow?"

"Yes. No. I mean I won't be whatever you said. I'm sorry I was."

"Don't be," said Hal.

"All right, I won't." Then, in a moment, her soft voice said, "I'm going now. Good night. Thanks for a lovely shower."

"Hey, my towel," said Hal.

"You want it back?" she said, mildly incredulous.

"Oh, goodness, yes."

"But—" she paused and Hal waited a moment.

"It's my towel, isn't it?" he said without sympathy.

The end of the towel flopped into sight. "It's wet," she said. "Good night."

"Good night, Barry," he said.

He stopped his shower and took the towel. It was damp, faintly fragrant as he brought it near. He hesitated: Why was it wrong to use it? The sparkling of his gray eyes went faintly sober; and, folding the towel, he stuffed it into the pocket of his slicker. Suddenly Barry's voice came casually over the top of the partition again. "What's your first name?"

"Oh, hello," he said as if she'd caught him at something. "Hal. Henry. Hal. Why? No, I didn't mean that."

"Didn't mean what?"

"The 'why.'"

"Night," she said. "Pleasant dreeeams."

"Same to you, uh—Garbo."

He heard her door close and latch. Slicking the loose water from his skin with his hands, the impulse to chuckle kept nudging comfortably at his stomach. And we shall meet again, I trust.

CHAPTER III

Wednesday

The morning light looked washed, the air carried the semblance of refreshment from the night, and the rich smell of the exhaust seemed hopeful as they started off, aiming for breakfast at some near town. Miller seemed to think nothing had changed since yesterday for, after he had lashed the luggage under the tarpaulin behind, he climbed into the driver's place. "Not today," Hal said to him. "Better try your invention, in back." They hadn't gone a mile down the road before Mrs. Pulsifer hurled the debris of her eye-opening orange at her raised window.

"Shouldn't do that," said Pulsipher. "Dangerous."

"Oh, dangerous pussycats!" she snapped at him.

Hal looked over at Kerrigan whose eyes were smiling as he peeled a peach with a large knife. The knife caught Hal's eye; the single, tapered, four-inch blade was set to a handle of natural stag-horn, also tapered, with a ring at the thick end.

"Nice knife," he said.

"French," said Kerrigan, regarding it. "Laborers use 'em to cut their bread at lunch and each other Saturday nights."

"Is that what you'll use to—when you round out your collection?"

Kerrigan gave an innocent, generous smile. "Might," he said. He finished his neat peeling of the peach and held it over the wheel where Hal could see it. "Manage that?"

"Oh, thanks," said Hal, and took it.

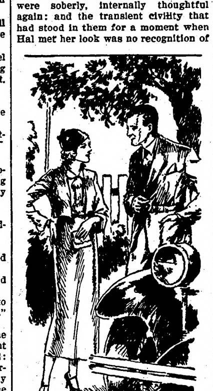
The car, with its age, ailments, and unnatural load, was cranky, and Hal guessed it might be a good thing that the driver's rear-vision mirror didn't give him Barry's face to look at. Instead it showed Sister Anastasia's, tranquil and immaculate, below the oblong of the back window. And when Hal glanced up, out of an habitual alertness for motorcycle police, he saw the nun's head occasionally turned toward Barry, her lips moving, her expression one of comfort, of trust, of intimacy almost. He strained his ears for a hint of what they might be talking about, but their murmurs were unintelligible among the dry and labored songs of the car's antiquity.

Hal remembered yesterday's sense of portent, of the shadow of something impending—like a presence with them. It had been odd, almost-vivid, and he had been half waiting for it to come again. If it came, and he could see Sister Anastasia look like that—her serenity made deep, limpid, cool round the traces of an unforgotten sadness near her eyes—the feeling wouldn't make him uneasy again. And it might not come. Purged of his own confusion of spirit, with Miller's outrageousness on the road and his sleepy thievery disarmed, the atmosphere was healthier. There were possibilities to look to: Barry, with her first defenses relinquished; he and Kerrigan running their own expedition from Detroit after today and— He must get Kerrigan at lunch time and decide what was best to do about Miller in Detroit: turn him off loose, try to get him blacklisted with the agencies, if they bothered with blacklists, or let the police have a go at him. The man oughtn't to be at large, and yet it might. . . .

"Say," came Crack's indolent, confederate murmur close to Hal's ear: "thought any 'bout what you'll do to this bird Miller?"

* * * * * * *

Hal snatched a bite of breakfast and, to save time, went off to have the car sustained with water, gas, and oil while the others either joined or watched the Pulsiphers celebrate the earnest ritual of eating. Barry's eyes were soberly, internally thoughtful again: and the transient civility that had stood in them for a moment when Hal met her look was no recognition of their advance of the night before. When he came back to the breakfast place, she gave him her polite recognition and would have turned away if he hadn't held her eyes with the steady, curious twinkling of his.



"Must You Be So Solemn?" He Said.

She raised her eyebrows—simple, cleanly traced, barely curved—and prompted him. "What?"

"Must you be so solemn?" he said. "You look as if you couldn't remember whether you'd turned off the gas at home."

She smiled without especial joy. "The morning's always solemn," she said. "Everything's so clear."

"How everything?"

"Oh, strength," she said, "and fear and things like that. In the morning you know it's silly to be afraid of the dark, but you know that when the dark comes you'll be afraid again."

"Are you afraid of the dark?"

She shook her head a little. "Not in the morning," she said. "Kerrigan wants a paper. If I find a place open, do you want one?" Not a personal favor.

Hal bowed, with a smile as politely reticent as hers. "Love it," he said.

She left him, and Hal rummaged in the car for a tire gauge. Then Miller came out, blinking in the sun.

"Got a tire gauge?" Hal said.

"Sure," said Miller.

"Throw it on all round and see what we've got, will you?"

Mrs. Pulsipher came through the door then, followed by Sister Anastasia and Crack. Miller half turned his grin toward them, and said with his air of sleepy cleverness: "You're drivin'. Whyn't you do it?"

Hal looked up smartly: at once Miller's bleary grin was less certain of itself. Was the man possessed of some animal loathsomeness that could affect others? Hal couldn't think there was enough energy of spirit for that behind the glazed eyes. He commanded Miller's flimsy effrontery with his eyes, conscious that the golf ball in Crack's lazy hand had stopped joggling, as if sharing its master's curiosity to see what Hal would do.

"Check the tires," said Hal quietly.

As he watched Miller go for the gauge, Hal's hands hung clear of his body, carefully, as if he had been handling sewage.

So this day too was started with something wrong, something almost stealthy in it—something besides the infirmities of the car and the heat that grew to a slow embrace of everything in the hazy, still landscape. To get to Detroit quickly, to be quit of Miller and the car—that was the focus for urgency. Miller might, under his unwashed stupor, possess some faculty for making Hal discontented with his own skin. At least there was no point in trying to tell what made it till this man was dropped.

The engine was little by little making up its mind to quit, discouraged by the brevity of easier gradients and cowed by a team of three big busses that charged down—a fierce happiness in their flapping tarpaulins—from the Alleghany summits.

"This is bad enough," said Kerrigan. "But think of hopping the Atlantic. Listening for the horses to cool off every second for thirty hours would harden all my arteries, give me a million dollars' worth of persecution complex." And over his shoulder he asked Miller, "What's the matter with this studio-number of yours, Robin Hood?"

"Little warm," said Miller, like a doped horse-trader. "How far do you reckon it to Detroit?"

There was a sort of lazy triumph in Crack's saying, as if he had a map and a speedometer in his lap: "Between three and three fifty. 'At'll make it a long trip for today."

"We're going to do it," said Hal, "if we have to trade this barge for bicycles."

After a long, laborious time, the car churned out a last flat sneeze, and a solid sign by the road proclaimed a summit, with statistics to prove it. There was no higher land visible ahead. And a can and half of water sent the car off to the less rigorous dips and climbs of the Mississippi Divide like an old dog remembering the smell of spring.

It rained as they dipped down the last rolling land of Pennsylvania to the straight roads of Ohio. For two miles a short passenger train hurried darkly along the straight track that converged upon the straight road, Kerrigan musing on it, Hal glancing at him and at it with a pleasant sense of intimacy deepening between them. Then the locomotive cried exasperation at the crossing.

"Train comin'," Pulsipher murmured.

Miller chuckled. "I seen that quite a ways back," he said.

And for another two miles it raced away on its divergent course, white bursts from the whistle followed by its faint screams for crossings—hurrying urgently under its blackened breath as if it had the whole country to cross before night.

Then they came to Akron, a spread of buildings that grew irregularly higher toward a nubbin of the tallest, in the modern style. Mrs. Pulsipher knew it was Akron by the smell of rubber.

The city had lunch places, and that was important. It was near three o'clock.

Miller frankly distrusted the "Tea Shoppe" that had caught Mrs. Pulsipher's bright and hungry eye, and he wouldn't go in. But the lady made it hard for the others—impossible for John—not to follow her. The dog had dragged Barry down the street on a good scent, and Hal and Kerrigan let the others fill one table, avoiding the solicitation of Crack's lazily hopeful look.

"You and the princess aren't still walking round each other stiff-legged, are you?" said Kerrigan.

"Wouldn't be sure," said Hal, watching the friendly, brown eyes quizzically. "Why?"

"Oh, I haven't got any Kreuger blood in me," said Kerrigan quickly. "I just wondered if we could begin having a happy time—the three of us—or whether I had to be a referee."

"I think she's a grand girl," said Hal, calmly. "You'll forgive my asking what Kreuger blood's got to do with it."

"Kreuger made matches once along with a Mr. Toll," said Kerrigan.

Hal laughed and started to say something, but then Barry came in to them. Her unstudied smile of pleasure at having been waited-for barely included Hal in its beginning, and the end of it, with a leisured drooping of the eyelids, was all for Kerrigan. And that piqued Hal smartly, even while he pretended to chuckle to himself.

I know a weakness in you, beautiful, and I'm still going to use it.

But he found himself watching her carefully, alertly, as if he might miss something pleasant.

"First," said Kerrigan, when they'd sat down, "we ought to agree to be sociable."

Barry glanced up from her menu in innocent inquiry. "I thought we were," she said: "aren't we?"

"All right, we are," said Kerrigan. "You admit it. Then let us bare our hearts to each other, even as—"

"Oh, let's order something before that," Barry said. "The body, you know."

"Yes," said Kerrigan, on a sigh, "I know the body, to my sorrow. What is yours having?"

Hal suspected Barry of putting Kerrigan off in whatever he had been about to suggest; but when the waitress shuffled away, she said to Kerrigan: "Is it painless—your heart idea?"

"To us who are pure there—yes," Kerrigan said. "Here's what I thought—just for an awfully good romp. Each of us gives a short biography of him-, or her-, self, you see—like the suburban obituaries in the city paper—"

"Jolly," said Hal.

This material and directions how to make it up will be mailed to you for 15c for one package or four packages for 50c. Address Home Craft Co., Dept. A, 19th and St. Louis Ave., St. Louis, Mo. Enclose a stamped addressed envelope for reply when writing for any information.

Gas and Tobacco

Smokers are sometimes accused, by wisecracking friends, of conducting gas attacks. Less grounds for this accusation may some day be found in tobacco which has itself been the subject of a gas attack. Experiments pointing in this direction are reported in a German science journal. German-grown tobacco was subjected to treatment with ethylene and other gases, during various parts of the fermentation or "ripening" process. These gases are the same as those used in the United States to speed the ripe coloration of fruit and the opening of cut flowers. The results, as tested by skilled tobacco judges, are good.

UNIQUE HOBBIES BEING PURSUED BY COLLECTORS

When an old man died in Chester there were found in his house four large boxes full of tram tickets from nearly every tramway system in the world. For 20 years he had collected every variety of tram ticket he could find, and these he had sorted in alphabetical groups according to the cities they came from.

That old man and his hoard of tram tickets is by no means the only case on record of strange hobbies invented by ingenious people to pass their leisure hours.

In the case of a well-known K. C., railway tickets are the great attraction—he is reputed to possess more than 20,000. First numbers of newspapers and magazines form a second collection that he prizes highly. Incidentally, a number of people make it a practice to keep copies of papers in which momentous news is given.

A London man who was an ardent theatergoer had a whole library of theater programs—souvenirs of plays he had seen. Each had his remarks carefully noted in the margin. His collection was so complete that if you mentioned the name of an actress he could tell you in a few minutes all the plays she had appeared in since her rise to fame.

Stranger still was the hobby of a sailor. During a storm in the Pacific some flying fish struck the funnel of the ship and fell upon the deck. The sailor, who was ship's cook, had the idea of starting an aquarium on board, and every fish washed up or caught alive was put into a big tank.

Unfortunately for him, fish caught in the Pacific ocean stand little chance in a European winter, and a week of snow in the Thames killed them all.

GALA REVUE SET FOR STATE FAIR

Entertainment Program Soars to New Heights—Four Days of Auto Racing.

Reaching a new pinnacle in outdoor entertainment, the Minnesota State Fair, August 31 to September 7, will present the greatest array of attractions in its 76-year history.

Every conceivable type of modern divertisement will have a place on the elaborate $100,000 program. Topping the list will be State Fair Revue, a musical extravaganza, to be presented before the grandstand each evening.

Exploring new fields of amusement, opening a treasure chest of new ideas and new thought, State Fair Revue offers visitors something different in night show productions. Divided into six stirring episodes, the Revue combines ecstatic choruses, dazzling costumes, spectacular lighting effects, a revolving stage and a host of interlude features into a unified and fascinating panorama.

Fast Moving

The spectacle opens with "Flying High", portraying a scene of mad gayety with the music setting a brilliant tempo for the swift dance steps. In "The Opera", the second episode, highlights of the beloved light operas are presented by stars of the Metropolitan and Chicago companies.

The glamour and enchantment of the sawdust circle will be packed into the third scene called "The Circus". Here [illegible] horses in lavish trappings, skilled equestrians, sensational gymnasts and hilarious clowns will recreate the pomp and glitter of the big-top.

A Gold Scene, the most beautiful setting ever seen at any fair, will be the background for "The Follies", with 24 glorified American Beauties presenting swirling dances to the "hot" rhythms of modern jazz. "Rise and Cheer" will portray memorable scenes of the nation's history.

Climaxing this sensational production will be an entirely new and novel fireworks finale, "Festival of Light". Here, added to the brilliance of scintillating fireworks, including star bombs and skyrockets, will be intricate and awe-inspiring patterns of light cast by a battery of searchlights against a vari-colored smoke-screen background from newly invented shells.

Four days of auto racing are scheduled. Twenty-four of the world's speed kings, headed by Gus Schrader, will pilot their cars around the dirt oval, Saturday, Labor Day, Wednesday and Saturday, August 31, September 2, 4 and 7. The second annual Northwestern Class Trapshooting tournament will bring together 200 of the nation's foremost clay pigeon marksmen, competing for championship honors Thursday, Friday and Saturday, September 5, 6 and 7.

Premier Horse Show

The Evening Horse Show, with its $10,000 in stakes and purses and its nationally known equestrians and mounts, will be staged in the Hippodrome Monday to Friday, September 2 to 6.

Thrill Day again finds an important place on the program with Friday, September 6, set aside for an unprecedented series of spine-tickling feats of skill and daring packed into one electrifying afternoon.

On the midway will be the Royal American Shows.

GET your GREENS

WHETHER you play a nine-hole course or eat a nine-course dinner, it is most important that you get your greens. Fairways are pleasant indeed, but once you get to the green—it's more than pleasant. It's exhilarating!

It is most important that you get your greens in your diet so that on the course or on the job, you have that feeling of exhilaration. Greens put iron into your blood and pep into your system. They give you that get-going urge which modern living demands.

Spinach, For Example

Canned greens contain plenty of nutriment. If you like to save the time and effort of cleaning fresh spinach, for instance, open a can of it and you will find that the color, flavor and nutritive value compare favorably with that of the fresh. And, certainly, it is much better than so-called fresh spinach which has lost its food value and flavor by being packed and wilted in a bushel basket.

Perhaps you like to get your greens in delicious combinations. Here are some excellent ways:

Baked Spinach and Eggs: Drain and chop the contents of one No. 2½ can of spinach, reserving the juice for soup. Make a white sauce of two tablespoons butter, one and one-half tablespoons flour, one cup of milk and a little salt. Add three hard-cooked chopped eggs. Put alternate layers of spinach and sauce in a buttered baking dish. Cover with one-half cup of buttered crumbs and brown in a hot oven. This serves six persons.

Spinach Soufflé: Make a cheese sauce of three tablespoons butter, four tablespoons flour, one-half cup evaporated milk, three-fourths cup water, one-third cup grated cheese and salt and pepper to taste. Add two beaten egg yolks. Then add the contents of one No. 2½ can of spinach which has been well-drained and chopped. Fold in two stiffly-beaten egg-whites. Turn into a buttered baking dish and bake in a slow oven—350 degrees—for twenty to thirty minutes. Serve at once. This serves eight persons.*

The Weather

The weather the past week has been of a rather changeable vareity. Rain, wind and cold and hot days have been mixed in great style the past few days. Rain early yesterday morning held up threshing again for the day and it will not take much more damp weather to spoil what little crop the farmers are trying to save this fall.

Safetygrams

BY FRED W. BRAUN © The Safety Man

Those states having examination of drivers as a requirement before licenset are issued, showed the best accident records. However' this is not enough. The revocation and suspension of driving licenses is what makes a safety record in any state. As soon as drivers realizse that they are apt to lose their licenses because of their participation in a careless accident. they become better drivers. To have their licenses revoked for repeated traffic violations will soon bring them in line.

That is as it should be,

Some states do not seem to have realized that they cannot extinguish the accident fire with cupsful of water, but must use bucketsful.

Since carrots store so successfully, it is not wise to fill many jars with carrots", says Miss Inez M. Hobart' extension foods specialist, University Farm, St. Paul. "If stored in sand which is kept slightly moist in a cool place, carrots will keep tender and sweet all winter. However if you wish to can a few young tender carrots, scrape the carrots, wash thoroughly, cut in strips, dice or leave whole. Bring to the boiling point and boil for from 5 to 15 minutes. Pack in cans and process pint jars or No. 2 tin cans 30 minutes at 10 pounbs pressure; quarts, 35 minutes at 10 pounds pressure."

Register With The NRS

Registration with the National Re-employment service is required before either relief or work can be provided.

In making public this ruling L. P. Zimmerman, SERA administrator, said that while some counties of the state have 100 percent registration of employables they still have clients certified by social service division for employment but who have not reported to the NRS.

"Persons certified for employment by SERA must report to the NRS before they can get work or relief," Mr. Zimmerman said. "The NRS is the clearing house for employment. Even if the client was registered some time ago and later certified for employment he still is required to report to the NRS for assignment to work."

Mr. Zimmerman also pointed out that more than one person in a family or case can be determined elegible for employment and suggested that all those eligible register with the NRS.

Ethel Vatendahl is now employed at the C. H. Gunheim store.

New Check Paper Used

Merchants no longer need fear the dangers of cashing forged or raised SERA payroll checks.

A specially prepared check paper which can not be duplicated, raised or otherwise altered has been obtained for payroll purposes as a safegaurd both to the payor of the check and the business concern cashing it.

Decision to use this special paper was reached by L. P. Zimmemian, SERA administrator following the theft and duplication of more than 95 checks which were cashed by merchants and honored by banks before detection of the forgeries was made. About $2,000 have been lost through forgeries and duplications of checks Mr. Zimmerman said.

The paper to be used for payroll checks has been given a chemical treatment whereby use of any chemical will immediately reveal the word "void". A photographed check has never been used successfully, and an attempt at erasure leaves a blank white spot on the paper.

This type of paper is being used successfully by concerns employing large numbers of men R. W. Cleveland, head of the SERA department of investigation, said. However, he stressed the importance of identification of the payee named on the check Identification cards are furnished SERA employes who readly can be identified by them.

Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Nordale and daughter Alida of Fertile and Mrs. Mickey andchildren of Minot visited at the Mrs. A. I. Haugen and J. Hagberg homes Friday and Saturday.

ALL ABOARD for better bean dishes

KNOWING beans is the business of the modern cook. There are so many kinds and so many ways of preparing them that it is possible to have this good food in infinite variety. Even inventors have got busy and put on the market a very ingenious device for slicing string beans.

Canned beans are already sliced, tender and delicious to serve direct from the can. So are oven baked beans, limas, baby limas and many others. So set sail for uncharted islands of better fare — and take along these recipes as a bon voyage gift:

Stringless Beans with Beurre Noir: Heat one and one-half cups of canned stringless beans. Drain and pour into a hot serving dish. Melt one and one-half tablespoons butter until a delicate brown, add one and one-half tablespoons vinegar. Heat and pour over the beans. Serve at once. This serves two persons.

Lima and Kidney Beans

Lima Beans En Casserole: Sauté one small minced onion and one shredded green pepper in one tablespoon fat for five minutes. Add the contents of one can of tomato soup and the contents of one No. 2 can of lima beans. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Pour into a buttered casserole and bake for thirty minutes in a moderate oven — 375 degrees. This serves six persons.

Bean Stuffed Peppers: Cut off the stem ends of six green peppers and remove the seeds. Drain one No. 2 can of kidney beans, reserving the liquid, and add enough canned tomato soup to moisten well (about one-third or one-fourth of a can of soup). Fill the peppers with the mixture. Cut two slices of bacon in short pieces, and put one on top of each pepper. Place in a pan with a little hot water and bake at 375 degrees until tender. Heat together the remaining soup and the liquid from the beans, and serve over the peppers. This serves six persons.*

Miss Beulah Bennes left for the Twin Cities on Saturday evening where she will attend the State Fair.

HELP NEEDED

"George Washington Tubbs," said the judge, sternly, "you're entirely no-account and shiftless—and I'm going to send you away for a year with hard labor."

"Please, Jedge," interrupted Mrs. Tubbs from the rear of the courtroom, "will yo' Honah jes kinder split dat sentence? Don't send him away from home, but let dat hard labor stand."

That's the Idea

"My papa's a mounted policeman," said little Pat to his mother's visitor.

"Is that better than being a foot policeman?" she asked.

"'Course it is," replied Pat. "If there's any trouble, he can get away quicker."

Mussolini Won't Give Up His Ethiopian Adventure

MUSSOLINI is determined to conquer Ethiopia, and all Europe is trembling. Il duce evidently feels that his personal prestige is at stake, and to him that means the continuation of the Fascist regime. Anthony Eden and Pierre Laval offered Italy what would amount to a mandate over Haile Selassie's realm, but that was not enough, so the tri-power conference in Paris was declared adjourned. The friendship between France and Italy must be ruptured. Great Britain will insist on action by the League of Nations council when it meets September 4. There is no reason to believe that the council will do more than it did in the case of Japan's seizure of Manchuria, but it seemingly will be forced to denounce Italy's action, and that would be enough to induce Mussolini to withdraw his country from the league. If and when Italy defies the league, that pretentious body, previously defied successfully by Japan and Germany, will amount to little. No wonder the statesmen of Europe are jittery.

Baron Aloisi

One high French official was quoted as saying that Europe "faces a crisis like that of 1914," and he admitted that "France must resign herself to losing Italy's friendship." Others in Paris declared that France is now solidly with England.

After Baron Pompei Aloisi had submitted the Anglo-French proposition to Mussolini and had received the duce's reply, he told Eden and Laval that his master would be satisfied with nothing less than "annexation of Ethiopia in whole or in part." Laval was furious and directly accused Mussolini of breaking a personal promise made to him when he visited Rome. Eden abruptly brought the conference to a close.

In Addis Ababa the high priests of Ethiopia conducted a solemn service, in the presence of the emperor, praying for liberty and for deliverance from war with Italy. The head of the church said: "God will confound our enemies, will break their hearts and shatter their staves in their hands." And in every church in the threatened country the natives gathered and repeated these prayers. But in Italy Benito Mussolini was telling his fighting men, as they departed for Africa, to disregard everything but their duty to make war. Said he:

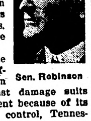
"We are going forward until we achieve a Fascist empire. I know you will do your duty with iron discipline and will not hesitate to make sacrifices until all our goals have been accomplished."

Will Rogers and Wiley Post Brought Home for Burial

WILL ROGERS and Wiley Post, crushed to death in Alaska when their plane fell not far from Point Barrow, were brought back to the states for burial by Joe Crosson, their intimate friend, in an airplane. And all their countrymen stood figuratively with bared and bowed heads as the broken bodies were laid to rest. None was too great and none too lowly to pay tribute in words and action to those two fine Americans, one a beloved comedian, humorist and philosopher; the other a leader among the world's aviators. They died as they had lived, adventuring gallantly, and the world is the poorer for their passing.

Push President's Program Through to Passage

SENATOR ROBINSON and other Democratic leaders in congress went into a huddle with President Roosevelt on the legislative situation and the possibilities of an adjournment within a week or ten days. They emerged with the knowledge that the Chief Executive still insisted on the passage of his "must" list of bills. These measures were said to be:



Sen. Robinson

The utilities bill, the tax measure, the Guffey coal stabilization bill, the ban against damage suits against the government because of its gold policy, alcohol control, Tennessee Valley Authority act amendments, a bill to impose NRA labor standards on firms which contract with the government, rivers and harbors legislation, the third deficiency bill, the oil regulation measure to ratify state compacts made at Dallas, railroad reorganization legislation.

Compromises on both the utilities bill and the tax measure were being worked out. The former, it was reported, would direct the federal power commission to decide which companies should be eliminated, but would leave wide avenues through which the companies could carry to the court their fight against dissolution.

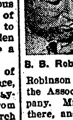
About two weeks ago, it is revealed, the Roper council, composed of some 40 business leaders, sent to the President a report urging strongly that the tax bill be deferred until the January session of congress, so that there might be time for the formulation of a carefully considered tax program. The council included a defense of holding companies, asserting they have played an important part in the country's growth and "should not be ruthlessly destroyed." This document was pigeonholed at the White House, which was highly displeasing to the members of the council though they should by this time be used to that treatment of their work.

Victor Over New Dealer Takes His Seat in House

WHEN Charles S. Risk, the Rhode Island lawyer who defeated the New Deal candidate for congress recently, entered the house on the arm of Representative Bertrand H. Snell, Republican leader, and was escorted to the speaker's rostrum to take the oath, he was vociferously greeted by the Republicans as a hero whose victory they thought presaged great things for the party next year. Mr. Risk took his seat on his thirty-eighth birthday.

Republicans Make Awkward Demands in Lobby Probe

MINORITY members of the senate and house committees that are investigating the doing of lobbyists started out the week with the determination to find out why Marvin H. MacIntyre, secretary to the President; Lawrence W. Robert, Jr., assistant secretary of the treasury, and Amon G. Carter of Fort Worth, publisher and friend of the Roosevelt family, were all found in the apartment at the Shoreham hotel of Bernard B. Robinson of Chicago, chief lobbyist of the Associated Gas and Electric company. Mr. Robinson himself also was there, and it was said when the door was opened at the knock of the sergeant at arms of the senate a "scene of revelry" was disclosed. For a day or two the news of this affair was not sent out from Washington by the news associations, reportedly because of the efforts of Mr. Carter to have it suppressed entirely. This, too, some of the investigators want explained.



B. B. Robinson

Republican members of the house committee also said they would insist on the interrogation of Undersecretary of the Interior Charles West and Emil Hurja, executive director of the Democratic national committee. West is reputedly the President's lobbyist and Hurja acts in a similar capacity for Postmaster General Farley, and both of them were involved with Tom Corcoran in the utilities "death sentence" lobbying that started the whole inquiry.

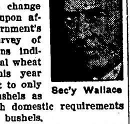
Nye Admonishes Cuba to Pay Interest on Her Bonds

SENATOR NYE of North Dakota has spoken a word for the American investors in Cuban public works bonds, interest on which has been defaulted. The senator is chairman of a bondholders' committee and he wrote a letter to Jose Manuel Casanova, president of the Cuban social-economic union which was in Washington as guests of the government. Mr. Nye contended that taxes had been collected for the specific purpose of meeting these obligations, and continued:

"If your government were financially unable to pay our citizens the interest that is rightfully due them on the $40,000,000 they invested in Cuban public works bonds, we should give sympathetic consideration to such a situation. But this is not the case."

Wheat Acreage Reduction Put at 5 Per Cent in 1936

SECRETARY of Agriculture Wallace has changed his mind about the reduction of wheat acreage for 1936. Instead of asking the farmers for a cut of 15 per cent, as was announced recently, the figure is now placed at 5 per cent.



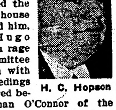
Sec'y Wallace

Wallace told reporters that the change was decided upon after the government's August 1 survey of crop conditions indicated that total wheat production this year would amount to only 608,000,000 bushels as compared with domestic requirements of 635,000,000 bushels.

The step was taken, he asserted, to assure ample supplies for domestic consumers. He said that it was expected to place the country in a "strengthened position" in the export market. He added the change in policy will not result in any marked reduction in benefit payment to farmers. He did not say what the exact reductions in the payments would amount to.

Lobby Probers Quarrel Over Witness Hopson

RIVALS in the matter of publicity, the house and senate committees on the activities of lobbyists got into a tangle that certainly didn't enhance their dignity. Howard C. Hopson, the long sought head of the Associated Gas and Electric Utilities system, permitted the emissary of the house committee to find him, and Senator Hugo Black flew into a rage and had his committee threaten Hopson with contempt proceedings unless he appeared before it. Chairman O'Connor of the house body was angered by this and declared: "Hopson is in my custody. I've got him. Nobody else has got him. Nobody else is going to get him."



H. C. Hopson

The elusive, chunky utilities magnate told the house committee about his various companies and related the saga of his travels while he was being sought. But he politely refused to answer questions concerning the sources and amount of his income. He testified that he "believed" the Associated Gas system had spent "eight or nine hundred thousand dollars" in opposition to the Wheeler-Rayburn utility control bill.

"That's just a small fraction of the $300,000,000 equity in our companies which would be destroyed if the bill becomes law and remains law," he declared.

Late in the day Hopson calmly walked into Black's committee room and asked: 'Is some one here looking for me?' Black and his committee then questioned the utilities man for an hour or two and got mighty little out of him except smooth sarcasm that made the chairman quite furious.

Schacht Scolds Nazis for the Persecution of Jews

DR. HJALMAR SCHACHT, economic dictator of Germany, is a brave man. Once more he has dared to speak out strongly in reprobation of the Nazi persecution of the Jews in the reich, and of those who are attacking Christian churches. He declared such individuals were doing great injury to Germany's economic condition and retarding her recovery, and this is especially his interest as he is president of the Reichsbank as well as minister of economics. His strictures were applied to Julius Streicher, chief Jew-baiter, and Paul Joseph Goebbels, minister of propaganda, though he mentioned no names.

"There are certain contemporaries of whom one can think only with the prayer in mind, 'O Lord, preserve us from our friends,'" Schacht asserted scathingly. "These are the people who at nights heroically smear paint on shop windows, who brand every German who buys from a Jewish shop a traitor, who call all former Free Masons scoundrels, and who are unable to distinguish between religion and the abuse of the pulpit.

"Their aims are worthy. Secret societies have no right to exist in the third reich. Pastors and priests must minister to the soul and not dabble in politics. Jews must resign themselves to a realization that their influence is broken in Germany once and for all.

"But all these problems must be solved under the guidance of the state and cannot be settled through sporadic actions which seriously disturb business.

"It is absolutely essential for the offices responsible for German recovery that the world keep faith in Germany as the state in which law is respected. According to point four of the Nazi program, Jews cannot be citizens. Point five of the program provides that special legislation be prepared for them. This legislation is being worked out. Until it is published, existing laws must be respected.

"The same attitude applies to the church problem, which is of definitely greater importance to Germany than the Jewish question."

Just before this speech was delivered, Streicher had ordered his henchmen to arrest on the spot all Jews seen in public with German girls, and directed the vendors of his newspaper to investigate in their areas and report all "Aryan" domestic servants who are working for Jews. This information he promised to publish, with names and addresses.

FDIC Reveals Great Losses Written Off by Banks

FROM the Federal Deposit Insurance corporation comes a report showing that in 1934 the banks of the country wrote off their books a total of $1,131,000,000 in losses accumulated during the depression. The FDIC added that this was made possible because the banks received $650,000,000 net in new capital, which was supplied largely by the government's Reconstruction Finance corporation.

Despite these losses, the FDIC figures disclosed, the banks' assets rose from $40,610,000,000 to $47,370,000,000 during 1934, and that deposits increased from $31,300,000,000 to "about $39,000,000,000."

A belief that deposit insurance is not a cure-all was expressed by Leo T. Crowley, chairman of the FDIC, in his report to congress. He said insurance is "not a complete remedy for the ills of the banking system nor for unstable business conditions." He added that a chief controlling factor with regard to these conditions will be "general economic conditions and monetary and credit developments."

Heritage From the Old Days

The old traditions of the sea prevail. Meal time is not a conversational tea. At the captain's table it is not proper even to talk unless the Old Man speaks first. The mate always removes his cap and knocks before entering the master's quarters. If standing to windward on the poop when the captain comes on deck the mate promptly moves to leeward, so the Old Man will get the breeze uncontaminated. Laugh if you will, but the hand of a schooner captain is iron and the old niceties still prevail.

What sort of men sail on schooners? All sorts. Crews are sometimes negro or brown-skinned, with agile little men from West Indian islands, ruled by white officers, of course. More often they are Norwegian-born, Swedish-born, Danish-born, German-born, Russian-born sailors of the old school. Most of them are citizens now, but few schooner men were born under the United States flag.

SYNOPSIS

Following his father's bitter criticism of his idle life, and the withdrawal of financial assistance, Hal Ireland, only son of a wealthy banker, finds himself practically without funds but with the promise of a situation in San Francisco, which city he must reach, from New York, within a definite time limit. He takes passage with a cross-country auto party on a "share expense" basis. With five other members of the party, an attractive girl, Barry Trafford; middle-aged Giles Kerrigan; Sister Anastasia, a nun; and an individual whom he instinctively dislikes, Martin Crack, he starts his journey. Barry's reticence annoys him. To Kerrigan he takes at once, but he is unable to shake off a feeling of uneasiness. He distrusts Crack, although finding his intimacy with Kerrigan ripening, and he makes a little progress with Barry.

—7—

"Well, we don't have to die afterwards—unless we want to," Kerrigan went on. "And it's no fair dying either till each of the others asks one question. We draw lots to see who starts."

He broke matches to different lengths, offered them in his fist, the ends protruding evenly. He said, "Or don't you want to do this?" glancing at Barry.

"Mm," said Barry, and held out her hand. "Who goes first—long or short?"

"Long."

There was a thin air of excitement about it, as in a game of Truth or Consequences. Barry studiously kept her eyes on Kerrigan's. Hal rummaged in his mind for the right question to ask her when his turn came. And the little tenseness stayed about them after Barry had drawn the middle-length match, Hal the short, with Kerrigan to begin.

"Frankly, I don't know why I started this," said Kerrigan, his eyes cheerful and warm, "so I'll make it dull as possible. I was born in Chicago, fifty-one years ago, with a caul. My mother wanted me to go into the church, my stepfather wanted me in a bank, so I decided to be a cowboy. I entered the University of Chicago at the age of seventeen and came out of it again at seventeen and a quarter for a job on the range in Wyoming. I wrote up a barroom shooting and had the misfortune to get it printed in a Cheyenne paper. Since then I've worked on nineteen newspapers, being fired from one and resigning from eighteen in the nick of time. I am on my way to the twentieth, and last, run by an old friend in Southern California. I like horses, shad roe, and derby hats; and I never take old brandy except when I can get it. So there."

"Ah, is that all?" said Barry, her brows raised, her blue eyes tenderly disappointed.

"Enough for today," said Kerrigan. "Now it's—"

"But I get a question," said Barry.

"So you do."

"Any question?"

Kerrigan said, "The more personal, the more flattering," in quiet courtliness.

She looked at him, looked down at the knife she fingered in her firm, dexterous hand, then up again gently. "Have you been married?" she said.

"Never," said Kerrigan. "I used to keep coming down with love, but there was always something happened."

She watched him a second longer, the gentleness draining reluctantly from her eyes. Then for the first time since they'd sat down she turned to Hal, incuriously, and said, "You get one."

"The one time you were fired—" Hal began, watching to be sure it was all right. Kerrigan's look started a pleased dancing. "Why were you?" Hal said.

"Well, it's a long story—a long story," said Kerrigan.

"Then all the better," said Barry, low and comfortable. "Come on—you started this."

"Well, my friends, it seems I have a half-brother," said Kerrigan, still tasting the cheerful reminiscense: "older—respectable, systematic as a ball-team, steady, worthy, ambitious. He sings 'The Road to Mandalay' in his morning bath.

"I used to displease him very much in youth," Kerrigan went on. "So we didn't get along. He gave up the job of reforming me—and went into a bank and did well. Ten years passed. I had a job on a paper in Montana. My half-brother's bank sent him out to look at some copper mines that were in trouble and I was s'posed to get an interview. I knew the situation at the mines, and I was pretty sure the situation in my brother's head hadn't changed much in ten years. So instead of listening to what he thought he ought to think about it and getting ten years' accumulated Y. M. C. A. on the side, I smacked out a couple of columns of what I thought he ought to think and went off to sit up with a sick friend.

"My brother made his tail pretty big when he saw the interview, but it was bigger when he found out who wrote it. And before I could get to the office, I was fired. It was a dirty trick on him. But it made a new man of me. That was before I got used to having things make new men of me all the time."

Barry watched him for a moment of confidential pleasure, smiling, and then said, "I like that." And Hal suspected that if the tough cheeks hadn't been so thickly peopled with the little red veins, Kerrigan might have blushed.

"Now it's your turn," he said to her.

Her look at Kerrigan was unworried, but faintly reticent. And Hal was as intent for the parting of her full lips as if she were going to tell his fortune. Then in quiet leisure she said:

"I'm twenty-three. I was born in Massachusetts, in Deerfield. Both my parents are dead. I finished high school and was secretary to a country lawyer for two years. I'd always wanted to go on the stage, so when I—when things changed, when my father died, I got a job in stock. I had three years of that round the East, without getting to Broadway; and now I'm going to try to get into pictures." She looked down thoughtfully, perhaps relievedly, at the knife in her hand, to show she had finished. "Thanks for listenin'," she added, with a brighter glance at Kerrigan. "You get questions, too."

"What do you like best—to do?" said Kerrigan at once.

"Read," she said.

"You've read a lot?" he said.

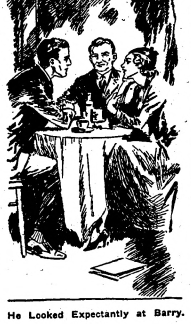
She smiled easily. "I learned to read when I was six, and I've read ever since. I've learned darn-near everything I know from reading—what I like, what I don't like, what I—what I want. I copied characters in books until one day I found I didn't have any idea who I really was at all. And that frightened me a little."

Lunch came then, and she seemed to stop sooner that she had at first intended. Hal hoped the obituaries would be ended too—including his question to Barry. He couldn't ask her any of the things he found he really wanted to know; and such passable questions as he thought of sounded silly. But when the dishes were settled and the iced-tea and coffee situation straightened out, Kerrigan looked at him and said, "Now your question."

Barrry looked up at Hal with a frank, quiet confidence that gave him unexpected pleasure.

"If you—when you make good in the movies, and have lots of money," he said, "what will you do?"

Her eyes were faintly surprised by interest and they stayed on his, appraising the picture he'd provoked for her. "I hadn't thought," she said. "If—if I should arrive. . . ." That picture was dubious, but the light lingered gently in her eyes, neither reckless with hope nor intimidated by disappointment. "If I should arrive and they plugged me and finished me, I'd go to England—France, to see it, to see if it's the place I've thought it might be. I'd live there for a while, and then . . . I don't know."



He Looked Expectantly at Barry.

Her lighted eyes came back slowly and without bitterness to the fragile cheap tearoom, strayed expectantly to the table opposite, where Mrs. Pulsipher's account of Niagara Falls had struck a snag in her husband's doubt that it was there they'd been charged sixty cents for tough steak with yesterday's onions. Whatever Barry hoped to see, she didn't see. Hal wondered if the loneliness in her look was accidental: he felt that if she'd been aware of it, she wouldn't have let it appear. "Now it's your turn," she said to him.

"I'll tell you," said Hal. "I'm twenty-six. I was born in New York, but if I had it to do over again, I wouldn't be born there: I'd only go there when I felt like it. I went to school and college in New England, and then was sent abroad—to decide what I'd do. I nearly decided on a career of just being abroad, but one dark, rainy morning I was carrying a sort of headache past a steamship office, when I suddenly went in and bought a steerage ticket home. I was a runner in Wall Street for a while. Then I got a chance at a job about three thousand miles away from the Stock Exchange, and took it. That's where I'm going now—San Francisco."

Hal finished, looking at Kerrigan; then he took a mouthful of cold chicken, suddenly eager to hear Barry's question.

"What business is it going to be?" Kerrigan asked; and Hal liked the implication that the more important things between them would come in their own good time.

"Air business," said Hal. "Expect to be started cleaning boundary lights at the field."

"Envy you," said Kerrigan. "If I had a son, I'd put him in that. Twice a year I give myself a good kicking for not having gone into railroads, at your age." He looked expectantly at Barry.

Her eyes were incurious—as if she hadn't till then thought of anything she could want to ask. And then, without more than the most superficial apology in her tone, she said, "Please don't answer if you'd rather not. The reason I'm asking—the reason stops and I forget I had it, whether you tell me or not. Are you Frederick Ireland's son?"

He tried to force from her clear, polite look a hint of why she wanted to know; but all he could see was confirmation of what she had said: she didn't ask out of idle curiosity and yet the answer wasn't momentous to her.

"Yes, I am," he said.

She believed him, but it gave her nothing to think about. And Hal swore he would find out why she had asked that of him if he had to back her into a corner on the last day and shake her firm shoulders till she told him. No, not shake them: hold them, perhaps, but not shake them. And it should be before the last day, too. I wonder, he said to himself, if you'd tell me why you wanted to know that, without my even asking you. If you weren't so good to look at, Miss Trafford, you probably wouldn't be making so much trouble for yourself.

"I've met your father," said Kerrigan, without especial significance.

"Have you?" said Hal. "Where?"

"In Paris," said Kerrigan. "When Wilson came over the first time. Were you with him?"

"No," said Hal; "I wasn't."

But Hal was wondering why, when it had never come hard to take challenges, he should shy at the prospect of later pretending to this girl that he was in love with her. She knew her way round; he had never seen her before and would probably never— Hal interrupted himself with a fresh wonder: why couldn't he easily conceive of not seeing her again? A little more than twenty-four hours it was, since they'd started: he didn't even know what she looked like with her hat off. Oh, the h—l with it: just remember how easily she can make you mad and don't go Travelers' Aid till you have to.

* * * * * * *

Straight roads long-laid across the flatness of Ohio, with the sultry, flat afternoon in a hazy layer between the land and the stubbornly moving sun. Then Kerrigan saw "Detroit" on a signboard at less than a hundred miles. Pulsipher hummed a vague, contented piece of tune over to himself; Barry and Mrs. Pulsipher were discussing Florida oranges, mail-order shopping, red hair, and railway travel, with Sister Anastasia's gentle surprise and inquiry between them; and Kerrigan pored over his pocket atlas, puffing away the smoke from his short cigarette, to identify each strand in the web of railroads that converged upon Toledo.

Perhaps two hours more; and even if the ease of relief was rolling in now with every mile, the thing to do was push straight on without stopping, whether stark hunger overtook the Pulsiphers or not.

"Say," came Crack's drowsy, confidential whisper near Hal's ear. Hal turned his head a little, his attention in alert suspense. "We could eat in Detroit," Crack said in softly impish conspiracy. "Run right through, we could—not give this bird another chance to try a quick one." Hal made himself ignore the coincidence: he nodded briefly and said, "Good idea."

If Crack, basking in the secret sunshine of his own little schemes, could be made uneasy, there must be something more to Miller's influence than Hal liked to allow.

In the next rising of talk behind them Hal leant a little toward Kerrigan and murmured: "Is there anything about that fella that—" He thought he saw understanding in Kerrigan's eyes and turned back to the road without finishing.

But Kerrigan said, "Which fella?" curiously. Hal glanced at him again quickly: the brown eyes still seemed to understand what he meant. And Hal dismissed the subject gingerly, muttering, "Later, later."

Across the Maumee and through the fringes of Toledo. It grew dark slowly; then the sprawl of a city began to infringe upon the openness, gradually and in disorder.

"Dearborn," Crack suddenly whispered, and Hal wondered why it sounded exciting, even faintly sinister.

Crack semed to know Detroit, and to invest the names he spoke with undertones of leashed significance: Telegraph road; Michigan road that went straight into the dark behind them for two hundred and eighty miles to become Michigan boulevard in Chicago; River Rouge—a dark-gleaming creek that curled under the highway and gave its name to the plant where had worked more people than it took to build the Pyramids or sail the Armada.

"You sorta feel things goin' on here," said Crack quietly behind Hal's head. "Don't you?"

"Yes, you do," said Hal.

"I like Detroit," Crack said in shy complacence. "I used to work here."

Hal had a quick curiosity to know what it was Crack had worked at; but something suggested that if he asked, the lazy, immature voice wouldn't tell him the truth.

It was nearly ten o'clock—the night breathless, the pavement still remembering the sun's implacability—when they rolled into Cadillac square.

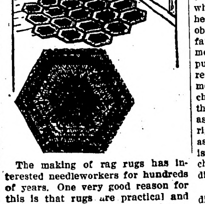
Different Ways of Making Rugs

By GRANDMOTHER CLARK



The making of rag rugs has interested needleworkers for hundreds of years. One very good reason for this is that rugs are practical and wanted in every home. The larger the rug the harder the work; the weight increases as the work progresses. Making a rug of motifs and then assembling takes the hard labor out of rug making and the work becomes interesting. Work these motifs in spare time at home or elsewhere and, when all are finished, assemble.

Folder No. 532 contains a lot of information about making the hexagon motif in various sizes in hexagon shaped rugs and in various color combinations. Hexagon motifs are crocheted in any size and color scheme according to your own idea. Amount of material and all the stitches are given and other hints of value to rug makers. A new kind of chart for selecting your colors gives you an opportunity to see what your rug looks like before you go ahead with the work. You can get some wonderful ideas from this folder on "Different Ways to Make Rugs." It will be mailed to you upon receipt of 10 cents.

Out in Front

"Are you a political leader?"

"How do I know?" asked Senator Sorghum. "I'm out in front, but maybe I'm only being pushed from behind by a stampede."

PROBLEM OF HOW BEST TO PUNISH CHILD SERIOUS

The problem of how best to punish a child to help him or her to understand the error of his ways so that a like mistake will not be made repeatedly, is one of the things which puzzles parents. Should the child have careful explanations of why the thing is wrong for which he is punished? Should he learn to obey arbitrarily with the reliance on father and mother's word and judgments being right? Should corporal punishment be banned in favor of restrictions? When many different methods have been tried and still no change for the better is the result, the problem assumes grave aspects, as there is a tendency to disregard rightful rules. This is, of course, assuming that the parent's judgment is correct, and not capricious. A child soon appreciates when the disciplining is not just.

Children are governed in so many different ways, that no hard and fast rule can be given that will apply in all cases, but, as a general thing, very little folk have to depend upon mother's and father's commands being final. For this reason parents should learn to be guarded in what they demand of their little ones. Implicit obedience of officers' commands, seldom understood by soldiers, is expected in army life, but home life is a different matter.

Affection is the guiding power. The parents love their children so much they want to bring them up to have respect for their maturer judgments, to understand that what was done was to help them to adjust to life, to deport themselves in an upright and honorable way, to strengthen home affiliations, and at the same time to teach them self government and that independence which is founded on a respect for the laws of the land.

The reaction of training the children in these things is beneficial on the parents. Their high ideals for their off-spring are stimulating. The knowledge that they, themselves, are patterns of excellence and represent all the virtues to the children whose belief in their goodness is steadfast, and also their belief in the goodness of other people is founded on this faith in them, bring out fine traits and qualities in the older folk.

SWEDISH SANDWICHES
for summer snacks

WHATEVER Swedes do they believe in doing well, be it the building of bridges, constructing canals, founding universities or—simply, making sandwiches. To the average American who is accustomed to snatch a cup of mocha and a ham on rye for lunch, the making of a sandwich may seem a negligible culinary achievement. But not so with the Swedes! To them sandwich making is a fine art and sandwich eating a national institution.

So here's a tip from the Swedes to the American housewife who wants to be prepared for those summer guests who always seem to drop in at the very moment when her cupboard is bare. Keep plenty of good bread and butter on hand. Stock your refrigerator with refreshing fruit juices and other drinks, and your pantry with a variety of canned fish, vegetables and meats. Then you can sit back at leisure and enjoy the breeze, serene in the knowledge that you will never be caught unawares.

Secrets from a Swedish Chef

"Swedish sandwich making is largely a matter of color combination and artistic arrangement in addition to the delicious taste," declares Paul Moll, chief chef on the S.S. Gripsholm of the Swedish-American Line.

Rounds of brown bread or white toast, thickly spread with unsalted butter, form the basis of most Swedish sandwiches. Hard native knäkebröd also is used. Spreads of chopped meat, anchovies or egg yolks, strips of smoked fish, discreet trimmings of capers or dill, make tasty morsels fit for a king. Swedish sandwiches are open like the face of a grandfather's clock, and as cheerful and gay as summer flowers.

Hearty Food for Sportsmen

After tennis or golf or a vigorous swim, folks simply aren't enthusiastic about thin "two-by-threes" with a sparse cream spread. They want something hearty that will stick to their ribs. For the purpose this beef sandwich seems just about right:

Beef Sandwich: Cover rounds of lightly buttered brown bread with seasoned chopped canned beef. In the center of each sandwich place a mound of grated egg yolk, garnished with a ring of chopped canned anchovies. Radiating from the center, arrange Vs of chopped onions alternating with strips of chopped capers.

Fancy Fish Sandwiches

"The Swede has an eye for color," says Chef Moll, "and even sardines must be jazzed up a bit." Here are some fish sandwiches which will appeal to your eye as well as to your palate:

Sardine Sandwich: Bone and skin half a Norwegian sardine, lay it on a round of white buttered toast, and garnish it with chopped lettuce and thin fancy shaped radish slices.

Smoked Salmon and Dill Sandwich: Butter crisp knäkebröd and cover it with parallel strips of smoked salmon, so placed that the butter shows between. Sprinkle chopped dill pickle across the center.

Egg and Anchovy Sandwich: Sprinkle brown bread with a center of chopped egg yolk and radiate from this center pieces of canned anchovy. This is another fine combination for a summer snack.*

LOVE and a DOLLAR

DING-A-LING-AL-LING!

"Hello? Oh, hello, dear. Don't tell me you're not coming home to dinner! Oh, you are coming—well, that's just grand. You're bringing—I don't hear you—whom are you bringing? Oh—Andy and Marg—that's fine. Be here at six, won't you? Goodbye dear."

And then she looks in her purse in the dresser drawer and finds—one dollar! One dollar for four! Well, you can't let a good husband down. After all, a dollar goes a long ways—if you know how to stretch it. People have learned that in the last few years.

Good Morning Grocer

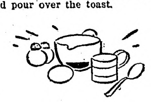
So off to market. Can't trust to the telephone. Andy loves asparagus, but suppose it isn't fresh picked. Anyway fresh asparagus is expensive if it's good. Canned asparagus is always good — you can phone for that. But then that nice pineapple and cabbage salad calls for fresh tender cabbage. Better go and select it.

The wrist watch says eleven o'clock. Ample time to get the canned raspberries and make that pretty raspberry ice cream that Marg likes.

Thus that perfect wife we read about sums up the situation. She's got more than love-and-a-dime. She's got love and a dollar—and here's what she bought and how she prepared the perfect dinner:

Hamburger and Asparagus Toast 36¢
Potato Chips 7¢
Tomato Fritters 13¢
Cabbage and Pineapple Salad 12¢
Rolls and Butter 8¢
Raspberry Ice Cream 19¢
Tea 3¢

Hamburger and Asparagus Toast: Sauté three-fourths pound hamburger steak in two tablespoons dripping until slightly brown. Stir with a fork to keep the pieces separate. Melt one tablespoon butter in a pan, add one tablespoon flour and stir until smooth. Add one-half cup water and the contents of a can asparagus soup, stirring until creamy and thick. Add the meat and pour over the toast.



Tomato Fritters: Beat one egg slightly, add two cups canned tomatoes, and one and one-third cups crushed cracker crumbs, and season with salt and pepper to taste. Let stand for ten minutes. Drop from a spoon into plenty of hot fat in a skillet. Brown on one side, turn and brown on the other side. Drain on brown paper. This makes about twelve small fritters.

Cabbage and Pineapple Salad: Combine one cup finely shredded cabbage and one-half cup crushed pineapple. Mix with four tablespoons mayonnaise and serve on crisp lettuce leaves.

Raspberry Ice Cream: Scald together the contents of one 6-ounce can evaporated milk, one-third cup sugar and three tablespoons water. Cool. Add two tablespoons lemon juice and one cup canned raspberries which have been mashed and pressed through a sieve. Freeze.*

SEES INFLATION A SLOW PROCESS

A Real Danger for the Future, Col. Ayres Tells Banking Groups.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.—Present prospects do not indicate that inflation severe enough to cause further dollar devaluation will come soon in this country, but as an ultimate development it seems to be a very real danger, Leonard P. Ayres, Vice President Cleveland Trust Company, said here tonight in an address before the Graduate School of Banking. He believed this statement to be true "unless the government enters frankly upon a policy of issuing fiat money with which to meet its expenses." At present that does not seem to be in sight, he said.

The Graduate School is operated jointly by the American Institute of Banking Section of the American Bankers Association and Rutgers University to offer advanced studies for bank officers.

"We have so enormously increased the capacity of our banking system for credit expansion that it is difficult to see how we could have a vigorous business revival without having it develop into a credit inflation," Colonel Ayres declared.

Inflation a Slow Process

If inflation does come it will be a slow proces, he said, pointing out that in Germany, France, Belgium and Italy it took about five years to develop from the time when the governments entered upon policies of financing large peace-time deficits by bank credit up to the time when the public generally began to spend money rapidly because of fear that it would still further depreciate in purchasing power.

"If we are to go through such a period here it would seem likely that it might last rather longer than the corresponding periods did abroad," he said. "Its beginning would date from the spring of 1933 when we left the old gold basis for our money and entered upon the policy of financing large governmental deficits by the sale of Federal securities mainly to banks rather than to private investors.

"The method that we are following is the one that proved disastrous in Europe for in all those countries including Germany, the increasing issues of money that caused the inflations were not mere printing press issues of fiat currency, but were secured by government bonds and notes discounted at the banks. Nevertheless, the process is inherently a slow one."

Among the clearest lessons taught by the European experience, Colonel Ayres asserted, is that there are "no good hedges against inflation." He added:

Did Not Lighten Debt Burdens

"One of the strange facts about these inflations is that while they destroyed the values of most existing debts, they did not succeed in lightening the debt burdens of either the people as a whole, or of the corporations.

"Inflation destroys the value of bonds and mortgages and so confiscates the property of these holders of obligations and hands it over to the shareholders and the equity owners. However, it introduces so many new economic difficulties that these share and equity holders are at once forced to incur new indebtedness so that when stabilization comes the problems of debt are about as troublesome as they were before, or even more so."

The five requisites of inflation were listed by Colonel Ayres as first, a period of sustained active business: second, a rising stock market; third, real credit expansion; fourth, greater outflow of gold "than we can tolerate which would force us to cut our currency entirely free from gold"; and fifth, continued large budget deficits in government operation.

Safetygrams
BY FRED W. BRAUN

Why do people get so reckless with their eyes? Thousands and thousands of glass eyes are manufactured and used in this country every year.

People driving along the highway frequently get something in their eyes and pay no attention to the irritant until it is too late. Workmen in industry become careless about eye protection.

We only have two eyes and when one of them is ruined we have just one more chance before total blindness. It is one type of accident that can be prevented on the highway, in the home, and in industry. Everyone should make a corcerted effort to see that no unnecessary chances are trken when it comes to eye protection.

The "eyes" have it!

Huey P. Long Was Shot

United States Senator Huey Pierce Long of Louisiana was shot in the Statehouse there on Sunday evening by Dr. Carl A. Weiss as he came out from a special session of the legislature.

His assasin, a mild-mannered young physician with bitter political enmity toward the United States senator, ex-governor, "share the wealth" advocate and potential presidential candidate, died ahead of him.

Bodyguards of Senator Long, killed the assailant after he had fired the fatal bullet through Long's abdomen.

Long's death came at 4:06 A. M., Tuesday, removing him from the political scene in which he had played a dramatic and colorful part in building the most amazing personal dictatorship in American history.

Funeral services were held at 4 p. m. yesterday and his body was laid to rest in the shadow of the $5,000,000 thirty-three story state capitol.

Mrs. G. Sanoden and Mrs. H. Hanson called at the W. Wegge and Gust Peterson homes Sunday afternoon.

MAKING IT HARDER FOR BANK ROBBERS

Mechanical Devices That Impede the Work of Bandits Described by Bankers Association Official

The impediments which the hard working bank robber now meets in plying his trade among small as well as large banks are described by James E. Baum, Deputy Manager American Bankers Association in charge of its Protective Department, in an article in "Banking" published by his organization.

"Protective equipment will minimize if not prevent loss," Mr. Baum says, "such as the silent automatic type of alarm, approved tear gas systems, several styles of bandit resisting enclosures and timelocks, or safes equipped with timelocks, which can be set for intervals of a few minutes.

"The silent automatic alarms operate in the beginning of a holdup and through actions carried out by the bank employees in obedience to the bandits' own commands. They are adaptable to the smaller banks which continue to be easiest targets for bank robbery.

Tear Gas Systems

"Tear gas systems have their advantages as self-contained protective units where outside aid is inconvenient or too remote from the bank to be effective. One objection to the use of tear gas in preventing holdup is the need of pressing a lever or button to discharge it. Although this necessary action seems too much to expect of the victims in a crisis where their lives are in jeopardy, the fact remains that tear gas systems have defeated bank robbery. Its deterrent value is also important.

"Different styles of bandit resisting enclosures are available. The lock manufacturers also produce timelocks which can be set to open at intervals of five minutes or longer. These locks are especially adapted for attachment to small safes or chests for safeguarding surplus funds while the bank is open for business."

Stock of Central Banks Usually Privately Owned

Of all the central banks at present existing there are only four whose stock is owned by the government. The newest central bank is that of Canada, which opened its doors only a few months ago after a most exhaustive study had been made of the experience of all nations with the result that the stock of the Bank of Canada is privately owned.

Agriculture and Industry

Returns for the first quarter of 1935 for industrial corporations publishing quarterly reports show net profits 21 per cent more than for the same in 1934. The total farm value of all important crops, exclusive of livestock, rose in 1934 to $4,782,423,000, as compared with $4,114,265,000 in the previous year and $2,882,195,000 in 1932.

State Trust Fund Land Sale

Dates for the sale of state trust fund lands at public auction have been announced by F. A. Wildes, Director of the Division of Lands and Minerals, Minnesota State Department of Conservation. Fall land sales will be held at the court houses in in 18 Minnesota counties.

Terms of the sale are 15 per cent of the sale price of the land involved in cash on the date of sale; timber and improvements cash on the date of sale, balance payable before 40 years, with interest at four per cent payable annually.

Mr. Wildes announced that lists of lands to be sold, with appraisals, may be secured from the county auditors of the counties in which sales are to be held, or from the Division of Lands and Mineral, 14 State Office Building, St. Paul.

Northwest counties in which sales will be conducted, place of sale, date and time, are as follows;

Kittson, Hallock, Oct 7, 10 a. m.
Roseau, Roseau, Oct, 8, 10 a. m.

Lake Trout Season Closes

Anglers who thrill to the quest of lake trout and salmon have until Sunday, September 15, to engage in this form of fishing, when the season comes to a close. All trout fishing in Minnesota will terminate at that time as the season for legal taking of stream trout ended on Sept. 1.

M. O. Mattson of Crookston spent a rew days here this week looking after his farming interests.

To Stop Commercial Fishing

Effective January 1, 1936, all licensing of commercial fishing in waters of the Minnesota river will be halted by the Division of Game and Fish. An order issued by Erling Swenson, division director, effecting that part of the river from Mankato to its mouth will make the entire river free from licensed commercial fishing because above Mankato no licenses were permitted.

The order was issued because of "grave danger of undue depletion of game fishes by a continuance of licenced commercial fishing in the river."

Safe Walking Regulations

2. Always walk on the left side of the highway against oncoming traffic.
3. Do not walk out between parked cars or any other obstructions on the side street or highway.
4. Streets and highways are not recreational grounds. Do not use them or allow children to use them for this purpose.

Those Little Green Globules

PEAS to you,—those little green globules which we are constantly discovering in the dishes which taste best for summer. They pop up in patty-shell dishes, in light summer soups, in sauces to make fish taste better—almost anywhere you look, at this season of the year, you will find those little green globules.

So if you are planning to entertain this summer—and you'll want to do a lot of it while the delphiniums are in bloom and the dahlias are budding—see that your shelves are well stocked with canned peas of various sizes. Serve the tiny ones as a vegetable, the medium sized peas in salads and reserve the larger, less expensive size, to simmer nice and tender in soups.

Here Are Some Recipes

Cauliflower and Pea Salad: Boil sufficient cauliflower to make two cups of the caulifowerlets. (Boil until tender but not mushy.) Marinate separately for one hour, the cauliflowerlets, one cup of canned peas and one can of asparagus tips. Then toss lightly together the peas and cauliflower and pile on crisp lettuce. Arrange the asparagus tips around the edge, and garnish with mayonnaise. This serves eight persons.

Pea Oysters: Press sufficient canned peas through a sieve to obtain one cup of pea pulp. Add one tablespoon melted butter, a few drops of onion juice and the following sifted dry ingredients: one-fourth cup flour, one-fourth teaspoon baking powder, three fourths teaspoon salt and one-eighth teaspoon pepper. Add one well-beaten egg yolk and fold in the stiffly-beaten white. Drop by small spoonfuls in hot deep fat (374-390 degrees) and fry until golden brown. Drain and serve with the meat course, either plain or with white sauce. This serves eight persons.*

Congress Session Ends; Long's Lone Filibuster

CONGRESS ended its session at midnight Monday—after the clock hands had been moved back three times—the house hilarious with refreshment, song and rustic antics, the senate furious because Huey Long of Louisiana had conducted a lone filibuster for seven hours and talked to death the third deficiency appropriation bill. This measure carried $93,000,000 tax to pay pensions to the aged, retirement pay to railroad workers and money for crippled children.

Senator Long

The Kingfish defeated all efforts to silence him and was adamant to pleas that he was cutting off funds for humanitarian purposes. He was insisting that the house be forced to vote on the cotton and wheat loan amendments to the bill which the senate had inserted but which the lower chamber had rejected. A compromise had been reached between the administration and the bloc of cotton state senators by which the cotton raisers were to get government loans of 10 cents a pound, and the wheat farmers were left out. Long would not stand for the elimination of the amendments thus arranged.

The Democratic leaders were afraid that if submitted to the house government loans not only on wheat and cotton but on other commodities would be voted at a cost of upward of $2,000,000,000.

They determined to let the appropriation bill fail rather than submit to Long's terms, although Robinson stated that information from the controller general's office indicated there would be no available funds for the social security program unless the deficiency measure were passed.

Most congressional authorities held that failure of the $103,000,000 third deficiency bill may delay operation until January of the bulk of New Deal legislation enacted the last two months of congress. It provided funds for many purposes besides those mentioned above.

The compromise cotton plan was accepted reluctantly by the AAA, and many of the southern senators were dissatisfied with it. The senators from the wheat states were disgruntled because the wheat loan policy was completely abandoned.

Sept. 12 Is Deadline for Works Relief Applications

APPLICATIONS for money from the four billion dollar works relief fund must be in by September 12, according to an executive order issued by the President. In addition, he directed all agencies—federal, state or municipal—to be prepared either to ask for bids or begin works operations by October 22.

The President has set November 1 as the date for putting his works program into high gear and taking all the unemployed off the relief rolls. The new orders, issued to the heads of all departments and emergency agencies, were regarded as moves to realize that goal.

Uncle Sam Warns Russia to Keep Its Pledges

FRIENDLY diplomatic relations between the United States and Russia, established in November 1933, will not longer be maintained unless the Soviet government mends its ways and keeps its solemn pledges to prevent Communist organizations on its soil or under its control from plotting to overthrow the government of the United States. This was the warning handed to N. N. Krestinsky, assistant foreign affairs commissar of the U. S. S. R. by Ambassador William C. Bullitt in Moscow, whose note was written by direction of the Department of State in Washington.

Ambassador Bullitt

The language of the note was not quite so blunt as the above, but it did not mince words and its implications were not to be doubted. It said the United States "anticipates the most serious consequences if the government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics is unwilling, or unable, to take appropriate measures to prevent further acts in disregard of the solemn pledge given by it to the government of the United States."

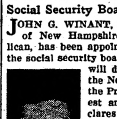
It was thought in Washington that Russia's reply might be delayed until the return of Foreign Commissar Maxim Litvinov, who was in Geneva helping deal with the Italo-Ethiopian crisis. It was Litvinov who personally gave to President Roosevelt the pledges that Russia would prevent Communists under its control from interfering with the internal affairs of this country, and in Mr. Bullitt's note these pledges are quoted in full, with the assertion that they have been flagrantly violated.

The American note called attention to the recent meeting in Moscow of the Communist International where the speakers discussed openly the plans for subversive Red action in the United States. The chief American delegates to this congress were Earl Browder and William Z. Foster, present and past heads respectively of the Communist party in the United States; Gil Green and Sam Darcy. Ambassador Bullitt sent to Washington daily reports on such of the doings of the congress as he was permitted to know, and after his final report he was instructed to lodge the protest.

Recognition of the Soviet government was, and still is, severely criticized by various elements in the United States, notably organized labor; and the friendly relations established by the Roosevelt administration never have "paid out" in the way of increased business with Russia because the Soviet government demanded extraordinary credits in exchange for orders. So perhaps our administration will not be too sorry if there is a rupture of relations.

Winant Made Head of the Social Security Board

JOHN G. WINANT, former governor of New Hampshire and a Republican, has been appointed chairman of the social security board, the body that will direct the part of the New Deal of which the President is proudest and which he declares is one of the outstanding social reforms in the history of the government. Mr. Winant's two associates on the board are to be Arthur J. Altmeyer of Wisconsin, who has been serving as an assistant secretary of labor, and Vincent Morgan Miles of Fort Smith, Ark., an attorney who has been associated with the Public Works administration. Each is to receive an annual salary of $10,000.



J. G. Winant

In sending his nominations to the senate the President stipulated that Winant will serve six years, Altmeyer will serve four years and Miles one year. All appointments date from last August 13 when the social security bill reached the White House.

As chairman of the new national labor relations board, operating under the Wagner act, the President named Joseph Madden, a Pittsburgh attorney. The other members appointed are John M. Carmody of New York and Edwin S. Smith of Massachusetts. J. D. Ross was nominated as a member of the securities and exchange commission, a job that it had been thought would be given to Benjamin Cohen, co-author of the utilities bill.

Mussolini Says Italy Will Fight Sanctions

GREAT BRITAIN, having ordered a concentration of naval strength in the Mediterranean for the purpose of protecting the Suez canal in case war breaks out between Italy and Ethiopia, followed this up by sending 1,000 troops to reinforce the garrison on the island of Malta. Immediately thereafter Premier Mussolini, in an interview in the London Daily Mail, made this portentous declaration:

"It should be realized without the possibility of misunderstanding that whoever applies sanctions (penalties for treaty violations) against Italy will be met by the armed hostility of our country."

The duce added that if the League of Nations voted sanctions against Italy, his country would at once leave the league.

In reply to a direct question whether there is the slightest possibility of his changing his attitude, Mussolini replied in the negative, saying "none at all—unless Ethiopia gives in."

Opening up of the vast Ethiopian interior, he said would benefit "all civilized states." Colonization of Ethiopia by Italy would "completely fulfill all colonial aspirations of Italy."

Death of J. N. Willys, Motor Magnate and Diplomat

JOHN N. WILLYS, long prominent in the automobile industry and ambassador to Poland for two years in the Hoover administration, died in New York at the age of sixty-one. He had been ill since last May when he suffered a heart attack. Mr. Willys, forced into business at eighteen by the death of his father, made his first fortune in selling bicycles. In 1908 he took over the Overland Automobile company, which was about to go into the hands of a receiver, and organized the Willys-Overland company at Indianapolis. Later he purchased the Pope-Toledo company at Toledo, Ohio, and moved the Willys-Overland plant there. He sold his automobile holdings to a syndicate in 1929, the deal involving several million dollars.

Thomas Alva Edison, Jr., eldest son of the famous inventor, died suddenly in Springfield, Mass. He was head of the research engineering department of the Edison plant at West Orange, N. J.

DIFFERENT AMOUNTS OF LIGHT NEEDED

A survey shows that 22 per cent of children finishing grade school have damaged eye sight. When they have finished college, 40 per cent are so affected. At age forty, 65 per cent suffer from visual defects. And at age sixty, 95 per cent have eye defects.

This regrettable increase in eye troubles is in many instances caused by eye strain resulting from reading, studying, sewing at night with poor light and not enough light.

Science measures light in terms of foot-candles. A foot-candle is the amount of light one standard candle shines on a surface one foot away.

For seeing one's way around and performing ordinary tasks which do not require seeing very small objects, 5 foot-candles is sufficient. For reading coarse print and large stitch sewing, you can get along with 10 foot-candles. For continued reading of ordinary print, or doing ordinary sewing, you need at least 20 foot-candles. For reading fine print and fine sewing, you require 30 foot-candles, or more.

Your light may look bright, but it is the illumination you get on your work that saves your eyes from strain; and this diminishes rapidly the farther away you are from your lamp.

Seated with your paper or work 3 feet away from your lamp, it will require a light of at least 275 candlepower to produce the 30 foot-candles needed to be certain your eyes have enough light to do their work without danger of strain and permanent injury.

If you use electricity, your light company will recommend the right size bulbs to use.

If your home is not wired, one of the new 300 candlepower kerosene or gasoline pressure mantle lamps will supply plenty of "live" natural light for every home need. It takes the pressure to give you all the light you should have.

SYNOPSIS

Following his father's bitter criticism of his idle life, and the withdrawal of financial assistance, Hal Ireland, only son of a wealthy banker, finds himself practically without funds but with the promise of a situation in San Francisco, which city he must reach, from New York, within a definite time limit. He takes passage with a cross-country auto party on a "share expense" basis. With five other members of the party, an attractive girl, Barry Trafford; middle-aged Giles Kerrigan; Sister Anastasia, a nun; and an individual whom he instinctively dislikes, Martin Crack, he starts his journey. Barry's reticence annoys him. To Kerrigan he takes at once, but he is unable to shake off a feeling of uneasiness. He distrusts Crack, although finding his intimacy with Kerrigan ripening, and he makes a little progress with Barry.

CHAPTER IV

—8—

Thursday

Hal had some difficulty reaching his friend next morning, and it was nearly one when he brought Kerrigan down from their room to see what he'd got.

"Really ought to look at it first through an old snapshot negative," said Hal. "Your eyes do better if you take these things gradually."

It was a great locomotive of a car—a certain high erectness, the small hubs and the spindly spokes proclaiming venerability; but deep green and bright brass, the pale taupe of the upholstery, the miniature lamps beside the doors, with a little red star in each side-glass, made its venerability that of an aristocrat who could ignore the fickleness of styles. Kerrigan looked and his eyes softened affectionately.

"Shades of Dempsey and Willard," he breathed. "What is it? A Martin day-bomber without the wings?"

"Nineteen twenty-three," said Hal. "Belonged to the mother of one of the directors and never been driven over forty. Cared for like an only child. Look at that upholstery."

Kerrigan looked and stroked. "Kings ride on fabric less rich,' he said. "They left the engine in it, I s'pose. But why Texas license plates?"

"Only ones they had handy. Thought it'd be interesting to drive from Michigan to California with Texas plates and a New York driving license. But the motor's sweet—sweet's a nut."

The solid, multiple chunk of the closing door drew an exclamation of awe from Kerrigan. He said, "You don't think I'll be embarrassed, riding up so high?"

"You'll find you see more of the country," said Hal.

"Right over the heads of the crowds that gather: true, true. It's a wonder we're alive. Tell me more: how much does the museum want for it?"

"Three hundred. And the tires, look at the tires—made of rubber, they are, and practically new. And everything works: the speedometer, even the cigar lighter."

"What's the railing up on top? Widow's walk?"

"No, that's the laundry yard," said Hal. "Colonel, if I didn't know you so well, I'd almost think you were making fun of—of. . . ."

"Chucho! there—y'see?" said Kerrigan. "You've gone and bought us a car and don't know what to call it. S'pose the others had come before it was named. The ignominy! We better go up and throw out a horn from the quart an old old dog-fancier left in my pocket this morning. Got to christen it."

"Drink?" said Hal. "At noon? Kerrigan, what d'you think I am?"

Kerrigan's eyes were merry. "Just about what you seem," he said, taking Hal's elbow and turning him round.

"Rasputin" had become the car's name by the time the travelers were ready to start. They were shown Rasputin in his timeless green-and-brass distinction. John smiled loftily, rocking back on his heels as if he were taking the air on the deck of his yacht; and Mrs. Pulsipher made a little exclamation of surprise, clasped her hands in front of her as if to be sure she wouldn't touch the paint, and gave Hal a look of interest and respect.

"Oh, it's elegant," she said. "Oh my, it's beautiful."

Barry and Sister Anastasia came up and Barry's look ran out to Hal in unguarded confidence. She came to his side to admire, and her low voice said, "Ah, it's a sweet old thing."

"Like it?" said Hal, showing her his pleasure.

"Mm," she said. "It'll be fun, won't it? And we can light the little carriage lamps sometimes, can't we?"

Hal chuckled at her more delightedly than he meant to. "Bet we can," he said. "And you shall have 'em—to keep—when we get there."

She looked at his lips, then up at his eyes—securely, expectantly, on the point of letting him pass another of the intangible defenses. But then she said only, "Why don't we start?"

"Because that miserable fella Crack isn't here," said Hal, and the brief confidence that had lain between their eyes lost itself.

Barry turned her back on the others, slipped her hand lightly inside Hal's arm, and he crooked it as they took a slow step or two away.

"How long do you think it should take to Los Angeles?" Barry asked him.

Hal returned the gravity of her eyes, all the while conscious of the casual resting of her hand on his arm, as if sensation paused throughout his body except just there where she touched him. And he wasn't sure he wholly matched her casualness as he said: "I hadn't figured it closely. It's about twenty-five hundred miles. Six days would be fairly brisk. Why, Barry? Do you want to hurry?"

Her look coolly disavowed any plea for herself. "You won't say anything if I tell you why Sister Anastasia"—her low mention of it was quite as lyric, tender, as the nun's had been—"is going to the Coast. She has a brother—at the Santa Barbara mission. He's dying. He wants her there before he dies—to forgive him for something wrong he thinks he did to her a long time ago. She's so patient, so good, so—humble isn't the word, because that sometimes means things not always brave and fine. She wouldn't say anything to you, but it's so much to her. I'm sure she hasn't heard anything for a long time. She doesn't know whether he's dead now."

Hal wanted to keep her hand touching his arm until he found the remark that would open some small slit of intimacy in her thoughtful, faintly anxious look. But all he said was, "D—n that Crack."

She watched him an instant longer, as if she expected him to say something else. Then she looked down at his mouth: her hand slipped from his arm and she turned round.

And d—n me, too, he said to himself, for letting that minute get away from me. What is it comes over you, Ireland, you yokel?

Lunch was not only eaten but digested, the luggage was all up on the widow's walk under a spanking new tarpaulin, and still Crack hadn't come. A high clock somewhere round the corner struck four times. Hal, squatting on Rasputin's roof, murmured down to Kerrigan, "H—l with him. Let's leave his bag and his fare and shove off."

"Had to Telegraph New York. Business. The Answer Was Slow Comin' Back."

Casually Barry said, "I don't think that'd be fair—to leave him, do you?"

"Why not?" said Hal. "If we make a couple of hundred miles before bedtime, we might be one night less on the road."

Conviction backed up Barry's casual looking at Kerrigan, and Hal's obstinacy rose.

"But suppose—" Barry began, and Kerrigan interrupted; "Here he comes."

Barry lifted Doc under her arm and got into the car without hurry, as if her stand about Crack hadn't really mattered to her. Hal vaulted to the pavement as Crack came up, and said to him, "Any day this week young fella. Where the devil have you been?"

Crack flushed. "Awfully sorry," he said. "I got delayed, awful sorry." His hand came from his jacket pocket and he dropped his look modestly to watch the golf-ball fall to the pavement and bounce up to his hand again. Then, as if Hal were the only one to share an understanding of the ways of the world, he said, "Had to telegraph New York. Business. The answer was slow comin' back."

He wasn't as young as he superficially looked, Hal decided; it wasn't only his old-fashioned air—straight-brushed hair and jacket buttoned high to the small opening—that gave him maturity. And whatever bemused his light, drowsy eyes remained private to them not wholly through shyness. Telegraph New York on business and wait for an answer. . . .

It went through Hal's mind quickly and vividly, like something he had thought of before and forgotten, and there was no pause before he said, "Get in. Your bag's up."

Crack looked up at the rack, then along the length of the car, immune to hurry.

"Nice car," he said shyly, as if he knew something about it that Hal didn't.

They had gone 20 miles westward when Pulsipher gave a lost wail of dismay. "That man—tha—that man."

"Good Gad, sir, what man?" asked Kerrigan.

"He's not here," John said, his desperation rising. "We left him behind. That driver. That Miller. Our fares."

All previous discussion of the matter—of Miller's dismissal and Hal's possession of the fares—had flown past John's ears, it turned out. And as Kerrigan explained it, among eager oh's and ah's of understanding, Hal became aware that he had undertaken responsibility of a sort here. Where, forty-eight hours ago, he hadn't given a Continental whether any of them got anywhere or not, he was now being trusted to land them all in Los Angeles safe, soon, and at no further expense. It gave him an odd feeling near the pit of his stomach—not to be defined at all—before he forgot it.

Dusk came early because of the shredded-cotton comforter of cloud low under the sky; and when they turned south at Coldwater for the Indiana border there was a warm rain-smelling breeze. It was dark when they got to Fort Wayne, and while they were at supper there was a splatter of rain flew at the window.

It was agreed to push on a little farther, giving the weather of night a chance to make up its mind. And promptly it made up its mind to drench water down upon the world.

A pair of brilliant headlights moved toward them through the dark rain: a truck and trailer, enormous, with wide toplights and a line of little green crystals along its side. Hal eased the accelerator farther, bending forward to keep track of the road's edge. Then, made startling as physical assault for all its quiet, Crack's whisper sounded behind him: "Stop it—brakes: easy!" There was nothing to see—nothing; but Hal gave the brake-pedal intermittent touches, cursing the groundless authority in that whisper as he did it. The headlights thundered past, and there in the rain-streaked glare close ahead, a figure in a gleaming poncho rode a bicycle. Hal swung aside for him, feeling a confused emptiness hold his chest for an instant, telling himself he was finished with that uneasy premonition, that sense of portent. He partly turned his head to ask Crack, "How the deuce did you see him?" Crack didn't answer at once; after a little, his whisper came, drowsing again in shy satisfaction: "I—I just sorta—saw him."

It was near ten o'clock when they came to Huntington and they would have been ready to spend the night there even if, at the first corner, they had not seen a white sign proclaim "Tourists" on the lawn of an old house. The cheerful, untidy young woman told Kerrigan in loud surprise that she had two double rooms and three singles and failed to keep entirely calm before the coincidence that these accommodations would fit them. With the luggage down and in, Hal managed to divert her mind to thoughts of where the nearest garage was—one where he might find a mechanic and a grease gun.

"I'll be right back," Hal said to Kerrigan. "See that everybody gets settled and book an early call—five-thirty, say."

But he wasn't right back. The elderly night-man at the garage found everything pretty dry and was delighted to have some one to talk to. Hal got away in just under an hour. The rain had stopped; the air was refreshed, good, almost cool, and the waning moon rode silent over the last hurried shreds of cloud. Hal found himself possessed of a juvenile eagerness to get back to the house—an eagerness out of all proportion to the chances of Barry's being up, out of proportion to the importance of any slight scene of challenge and adroitness that might be between them if she were.

He tried the door and found it locked. A dim figure came toward the net-curtained window, and Hal had to put down a quick resurgence of excitement. The door swung timidly open and the untidy young woman's stage whisper scraped round its edge: "They're all in bed. I waited up for you. I'll just lock up and show you where your room is. I was telling Daddy how lucky it was you all could just fit, some of you married and all. Daddy's a great one for talking. You'll see him in the morning. He likes strangers. Oh no, but you're going so early, aren't you, you won't see him." And so on halfway up the stairs, where she suddenly interrupted herself to hiss a harsh "Shhhhh" at Hal.

There was a low light over the landing. Eyebrows raised, head nodding, she stabbed her finger several times at the first door. "Good night," she whispered loudly, like a conspirator.

Hal wished he weren't so wide awake; he'd be sorry in the morning. He opened the door gently, hoping Kerrigan was too deeply asleep to be disturbed. But the light from the street lamp, striking upward on the white celing, revealed a broad and unoccupied double bed against the wall. Good, thought Hal: I'll read. He pressed the door shut with less care, shot the bolt under his hand, and found a light switch on the wall at first stroke. The light clicked on, and only then he heard a breath quickly caught behind him in the room. He turned, and Barry's blue eyes, with a gleaming rim of wet along each lower lid, were wide and anxious on him.

Migrates Easily

Home to the coyote is wherever he digs his den. He migrates easily and upon slight provocation. Coyotes multiply rapidly. The litters are large, averaging five to seven puppies, which look much like young German police dogs. With the coyote's adaptability, shrewdness, boldness, and ability to multiply, it is possible they may eventually inhabit the entire United States

ARMY ACE MAKES TARGET RECORD

It looked like the ace of aces, Lieut. Frank Luke, Jr., was flying again when Lieut. Frederic C. Gray hit target after target from his diving plane. Gray scored 1,176 out of a possible 1,750 points in firing at ground targets and targets towed by other planes to win the Luke Memorial trophy for aerial pursuit gunnery at March field, California. A member of the Golden Bear Seventy-third attack squadron the lieutenant from Abilene, Texas, was the first reserve officer to win the trophy.

The young man for whom the trophy was named was also from the Southwest—Phoenix, Ariz. Erratic, disobedient and always on the verge of a court martial Luke set a record during the World war that had never been equaled in any air force. He won 18 aerial victories in six weeks at St. Mihiel and brought down 13 Boche sausage balloons in six days.

Luke was a good friend of another ace, Capt. "Eddie" Rickenbacker, who has recounted some of the young aviator's exploits. "At dusk on September 16, 1918," said Rickenbacker, "Frank told me to watch two balloons and promised that they would blow up at 7:15 and 7:19. They were two miles back of the German lines. At 7:15 almost to the second the first was gone. Just four minutes later the second was blazing."

It was Luke who originated the idea of night attacks on balloons just as they were being raised.

One night, about September 29, 1918, Luke went out and didn't come back. He sometimes flew off to visit the French and mess with them while his officers waited anxiously. "He was in Squadron 29," said Rickenbacker. "I always believed I could handle Frank and get the best possible service out of him and had arranged for his transfer to my squadron. The order transferring him reached me just after he flew out in the dusk that night. I still have it."

What happened to Luke was confirmed after the armistice. He had dropped a note to an American observer to watch for burning balloons. A few minutes later three in a row came down. Red Cross investigation behind the German lines revealed that Luke then encountered five German planes. Instead of turning tail, he broke up their formation and brought down one before his own plane fell. He was unhurt and refused to surrender when Germans surrounded him. He killed several with his revolver. Then they turned a machine gun on him.

Relieved After Using Cuticura

"My face was a mass of pimples due to some external irritation, and I was in agony for three months. The pimples were hard, red and large and were scattered all over my face. I was tortured with the itching and it kept me awake.

"I used many remedies, but to no avail. A friend asked me to try Cuticura Soap and Ointment, so I did. Soon an improvement could be seen, and after using for two and a half months my complexion was clear." (Signed) Joseph Paradis, 1078 S. Blvd., New York City, May 2, 1935.

THREE PATENTED CONSTRUCTION FEATURES MADE THIS NEW GROUND GRIP TIRE POSSIBLE

THE new Firestone Ground Grip Tire is the greatest traction tire ever built. It has 54% more tread rubber to give your car, truck, tractor and farm implements the greatest traction ever known.

Gum-Dipping, the Firestone patented process which soaks every cord in liquid rubber, makes it possible for this tire to stand the terrific strains and stresses of the extra pulling power. Firestone Tires are the only tires built that are Gum-Dipped.

The tread is built of extra tough rubber and designed with deep grooves between scientifically placed cross bars, giving super-traction and long wear. Firestone Ground Grip Tires are self-cleaning. (Chains are not needed.) The bars of the rubber are so placed that they will not bump on paved roads, giving you easier riding and longer wear.

How often have you heard the phrase, "there ought to be a law against such driving?"

Laws are not the cure. Legislation will not accomplish the desired results for controlling accidents.

It must be considered a personal responsibility for each driver to see to it that he is in proper mental and physical condition for the difficult and technical operations of manipulating a high powered vehicle.

All states in the Union have plenty of laws now on their statute books controlling traffic and the addition of any more means just that much more printing and unnecessary space on the statute books.

We are the ones responsible for laws and we are the ones that violate them. If we drive safely and carefully, there will be no need for extra legislation to control accidents. It is your and my duty to drive safely, carefully and sensibly.

C. A. Davis entered a hospital at Thief River Falls last week where he is taking treatments for rupture.

Hunting Season Opens

Sportsmen of Holt and community who enjoy getting out in the fields are anxiously marking time until Saturday noon, Sept. 21, when Minnesota's annual open small game hunting season gets under way. At that time it will become legal to take prairie chickens or pinnated grouse and white breasted or sharp-tailed grouse in 14 Minnesota counties.

The open season on these species of upland game birds will continue each day until sunset Sunday, September 29, with shooting permitted from sunrise to sunset daily except on the opening day when 12:00 o'clock noon is starting time.

Open counties are Kanabec, Pine, Carlton, Aitkin, Lake, St. Louis, Itasca, Koochiching, Beltrami, Lake of the Woods, Pennington, Marshall, Roseau and Kittson. All other counties of the state are closed.

A daily bag limit of five birds, possession limit of 10, and a season limit of 18 birds was established by the Minnesota Conservation Commission upon recommendation of Erling Swenson, Director of the Division of Game and Fish, following a careful survey.

A resident small game hunting license costing one dollar is required of all citizens of the state 16 years old or over. Non-residents are required to purchase a non-resident small game hunting license at a cost of $25.

Director Swenson warned that it is unlawful to use a hunting license or coupon of another person; to hunt in any state park or game refuge, or to carry firearms in such areas except by special permission; to transport any protected game or parts thereof in any receptacle unless tagged, and contents of such package plainly marked on the outside with license number, name of consignor and consignee; to shoot game from a motor vehicle or to carry firearms in a motor vehicle unless they are taken apart or contained in a case, unloaded in both barrels and magazine; to retain game more than five days after the close of the season unless tagged by the Director of the Division of Game and Fish or a state game warden.

Following the prairie chicken season, there will be open seasons for the taking of ringneckee pheasants, bob-white quail and migratory birds, with shootinf of the upland game bird varieties afternoons only from noon until sunset, and of migartorg birds from 7:00 o'clock a. m to 4:00 o'clock p. m., daily during the open seasons.

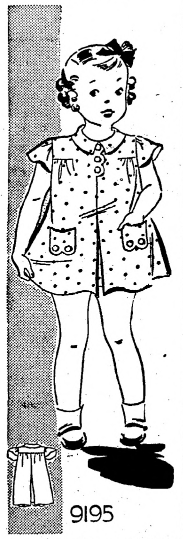
Tot's Play Frock That "Stays Put"

PATTERN 9195



Is she never still a minute? Racing madly about, arms and heels flying? Then here's just the little play frock she needs, the kind that will "stay-put"—the neat little collar and tidy button-up front keep the dress from pulling askew! The little skirt, with its front and back pleat, allows for freedom—and with the matching bloomers, what matter if she does play leap frog with brother? The cute flare sleeve is cooler, but the pattern permits a puffed version if you prefer it. You could outline the scallops with bias tape to match the dots and buttons. Most practical in printed pique or percale, and daintiest in dotted swiss, or dimity.

Pattern 9195 may be ordered only in sizes 2, 4, 6 and 8. Size 4 requires 2¼ yards of 36-inch fabric. Complete, diagrammed sew chart included.

SEND FIFTEEN CENTS in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for this pattern. Be sure to write plainly your NAME, ADDRESS, the STYLE NUMBER and SIZE.

Send your order to the Sewing Circle Pattern Department, 232 West Eighteenth street, New York, N. Y.

Sam—What do you mean, surefooted?

Johnny—He kicked me five times in exactly the same place!

Far From the Crowd

"Are you looking forward to a vacation?"

"It won't be exactly a vacation," said Senator Sorghum, "but I'll be glad to get away. A man needs some time to himself so that he can worry without being interrupted by speeches."

Insides

"What we want to do," said the excited citizen, "is to show the public all the inside facts."

"Why?" asked old Doc Pillsbury. "There is expert use for an X-ray photograph, but it is entirely lacking in popular fascination."

American Company Given Great Ethiopian Grant

Haile Selassie

FIVE days before the meeting of the League of Nations council to consider the Italo-Ethiopian quarrel Emperor Haile Selassie took a step that may complicate matters tremendously. The "king of kings" signed and sealed a document turning over to American interests sweeping concessions for the development of oil, mineral and other natural resources in more than half his kingdom. The charter was granted to the African Exploration and Development corporation, and runs for 75 years. It was obtained by F. W. Rickett, an English promoter, representing the corporation, and the transaction was witnessed by Everett Andrews Colson, American financial adviser to the emperor.

The emperor himself said the concession was given to Standard Oil, but officials of Standard Oil of New Jersey and other Standard Oil units flatly declared they had no knowledge of or interest in the grant. The company was incorporated in Delaware by the United States Corporation company of New York.

The governments of Great Britain, France and Italy were much stirred by this development. The British government formally "advised" the emperor to "withhold" the concession, asserting that it considered this a matter for consultations between the English, French and Italian governments. The emperor in an interview declared he did not see why a concession granted to Americans should create international complications or involve the treaty which the three nations named signed in 1906. That pact creates "spheres of influence" in Ethiopia but never was recognized by the Ethiopian government.

"As a sovereign state we have the right to do anything we please in our own territory," said Haile Selassie. "The United States is not a party to the 1906 treaty in which England, France and Italy merely pledge themselves to do nothing to encroach on the interests of others. This is one of the reasons I gave the concession to Standard Oil. As the agreement is already signed, sealed, and delivered, I do not see how it can be recalled if such a thing is suggested by the British government."

It would seem that this action by the emperor has forestalled Mussolini's intentions to seize and develop the natural resources of Ethiopia, though Rickett said he felt there was "plenty of room for the duce in the general exploitation of such a hospitable land as Ethiopia without resorting to force of arms." In Rome it was unofficially asserted that the concession would not alter Italy's military program and that for the time she may welcome commercial enterprises of a neutral character undertaken in Ethiopia because the job of exploitation there is so vast and complex.

It was announced in Addis Ababa that the emperor also had granted to British and Egyptian interests a charter for the conservation of the water of Lake Tsana, the source of the Blue Nile—which is of vast importance to Great Britain. It is proposed to build a dam and pumping stations.

Premier Laval Ready to Jump Either Way

Premier Laval

PIERRE LAVAL, French premier, went to Geneva for the league council session with full power to act as he saw fit in the Italo-Ethiopian affair, the cabinet having authorized him to oppose sanctions against Italy if he believed that wise, or to try to persuade the council to regard Mussolini's contemplated invasion of the African empire as a "colonial expedition" rather than a war. Laval's firm intention was to keep the friendship of both Italy and Great Britain if possible. For a time it was thought that, if he couldn't do this, he would stand with Italy, but later it appeared more likely that if it came to a showdown he would sacrifice Italian friendship for British. Herriot and some other members of the cabinet were reported to be in favor of sanctions.

Dispatches from London said it was rumored that the British government was ready to announce, on the day Mussolini starts war on Ethiopia, that it is no longer interested in maintaining the balance of power in Europe. This would mean it would not interfere if Hitler decided to grab Austria, which would be a terrific blow to the duce. The British admiralty sent its powerful Mediterranean fleet eastward toward the Suez canal and strengthened its garrison at Malta.

Mussolini went ahead with his war preparations, seemingly unconcerned by all the opposition he has aroused. In the military maneuvers he was conducting near Bolzano live ammunition was used in the artillery firing, and one soldier was killed and two wounded by shell fragments. In a fiery speech to the soldiers, with King Victor Emmanuel standing beside him, the duce shouted:

"The world must know once again that while there is talk so absurd and provocative of penalties (sanctions) we will not give up a single soldier, a single sailor, a single aviator."

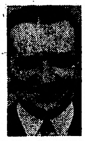
All the Italian submarines were assembled off Sicily ready to lay a defensive line across the Mediterranean from that island to Africa, and the Sicilian coast defense batteries were strengthened. The premier already has issued numerous decrees for raising the funds necessary for his adventure and to forestall embargoes.

Neutrality Act Signed by President Roosevelt

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT signed the congressional resolution of neutrality, announcing that he approved it because it is "intended as an expression of the fixed desire of the people of the United States to avoid any action which might involve us in war."

However, he made plain his objection to the inflexible provisions of the act, saying it was conceivable that situations might arise in which these might have "exactly the opposite effect from that which was intended." The resolution calls upon the President to place an embargo on the export of "arms, ammunitions and implements of war" to all belligerents in the event of war, and creates a national munitions control board. The application of the arms embargo lasts only until March 1, 1936.

Huey Long's Dictatorship Due for Investigation



W. L. Granfield

SENATOR HUEY LONG crowed a lot about the success of his one-man filibuster which killed the third deficiency appropriation bill, but he didn't add to his popularity among the people who looked forward for help from the agencies that are now hampered by the failure of the measure. Besides that, it is now admitted that his filibuster rescued the Democratic house leaders from a tight place in the matter of the cotton and wheat loans. Still further, it appears that Huey's domination of Louisiana is going to be investigated by a congressional committee. That committee probably will be headed by Representative William L. Granfield of Massachusetts, for he was the author of the elections investigation bill, which was found to contain a little "joker." This joker gives the committee such wide powers that it can probe into all the facts concerning Long's complete control of election affairs in his state and the methods by which he has attained to the position of a dictator there.

Russia Again Warned About Communist Activities

RUSSIA'S reply in America's protest against the subversive plotting of the Communists in Soviet territory was a rejection and a coldly worded re-assertion of the old and more than dubious position that the Moscow government is not and cannot be held responsible for the doings of the Communist Internationale. This was considered for four days by official Washington and then it was decided to let the matter drop with another and rather milder warning. The new note sent to Moscow said:

"If the Soviet government pursues a policy of permitting activities on its territory involving interference with the internal affairs of the United States, instead of 'preventing' such activities, as its written pledge provides, the friendly and official relations between the two countries can not but be seriously impaired."

Mrs. Harold Ickes Killed in Automobile Accident

MRS. ANNA WILMARTH ICKES, wife of Secretary of the Interior Harold Ickes, was killed when an automobile in which she and three friends were riding was overturned in a ditch at Velarde, N. M. Mrs. Genevieve Forbes Herrick, well-known newspaper writer; Ibrahim Seyfullah, secretary of the Turkish embassy in Washington, and Frank Allen of Gallup, N. M., the driver, were severely injured. Allen died later.

Mrs. Ickes, who for years was deeply interested in the Indians of the Southwest, had been inspecting an Indian settlement at Taos and was returning to Santa Fe. Before she went to Washington with her husband in 1933 she was a leader in club work in Chicago, and she served three terms in the Illinois legislature. Among the many notable persons who attended the funeral in Winnetka, suburb of Chicago, was Mrs. Roosevelt, wife of the President.

Norris and Mullen in Row About Power Plants

SENATOR GEORGE NORRIS of Nebraska and Arthur F. Mullen, former Democratic national committeeman for that state, are engaged in a warm dispute that may cause considerable embarrassment for President Roosevelt, friend of both men. Mullen carried to the White House a hot protest against a $20,000,000 power project which is sponsored by Norris. He is attorney for two $7,000,000 power plants which already have been approved by the PWA, and he asserts there is no field for the enormous amount of electrical energy that would be developed by the three projects, and probably not enough water for all of them.

The first project approved by PWA was at Columbus, Neb., 80 miles west of Omaha, and situated on the Loupe river. The second was on the Platte river, 150 miles farther west, at Sutherland, Neb. Both were approved in the fall of 1933. In addition to the original grants and loans approximating $15,000,000, there was added an allocation of $2,500,000 later.

In the rivalry between these two projects the same argument about the shortage of water was used, and Mullen was criticized for acting as attorney for both.

Report That Lindbergh Baby Is Still Living

ATTORNEYS for Richard Bruno Hauptmann plan to seek a new trial for the convicted kidnaper and slayer of Col. Charles A. Lindbergh's first-born son on the ground that the child still lives and that they can produce him in court.

The boy, five years and six months old and "the image of the Lindbergh baby," is said to be in custody of a Flushing (L. I.) family, which took him from an orphanage and adopted him.

Stock Raisers Urge That Tariffs Be Maintained

BECAUSE of the possibility of a continued increase in the importation of live stock and its products, an appeal in the name of more than 300,000 farmers and ranchmen, members and patrons of the National Live Stock Marketing association, was sent to President Roosevelt urging that present tariffs and sanitary restrictions on animals, meats, lard, and similar products be maintained.

In a telegram, signed by Charles A. Ewing, president of the co-operative association, the chief executive was told that any concessions in the way of lower tariffs and the removal of embargos preventing diseased foreign animals from entering this country would further cripple the live stock industry, and tend to defeat the recovery program.

Queen Astrid of Belgium Killed in Auto Crash

BOWED down by deep grief, the Belgian people laid to rest their beloved queen, Astrid, who was killed near Lucerne, Switzerland, when the automobile driven by King Leopold swerved from the road and dashed against a tree. Astrid's skull was crushed and she died almost immediately in the arms of her husband, who was cut painfully by the smashed windshield.

The queen's body, taken back to Brussels, was taken to the cathedral of St. Gudule for the funeral ceremony and then was interred in the royal crypt at Laeken, where lie the remains of the late King Albert. The services were simple, in accord with the characters of Astrid and Leopold.

Astrid, a princess of Sweden, became the wife of Leopold in 1926 when he was the duke of Brabant, and the marriage was a genuine love match. She immediately endeared herself to the people of Belgium. Three children were born to her and Leopold.

King George's Third Son Engaged to Marry

KING GEORGE of Great Britain announced the engagement of the duke of Gloucester, his third son, to Lady Alice Montagu-Dougles-Scott. The duke is thirty-five years old and is the soldier of the royal family. Lady Alice, who is thirty-three, traces her descent from a natural son of Charles II. The date for the wedding has not been set.

With his brother's marriage the forty-one-year-old prince of Wales will be the last bachelor among the king's sons.

BOLDLY defying Reichsfuehrer Hitler, the three cardinals, 23 archbishops and other prelates of the Catholic church in Germany, issued a pastoral letter, which was read in every church, strongly criticizing the anti-religious policies of the Nazi government and intimidating that the Vatican may enforce an interdict for other nations to break off relations with Germany.

J. A. Moffett Resigns As Federal Housing Chief

JAMES A. MOFFETT has resigned as federal housing commissioner, carrying out his long-expressed desire to return to private business. It was presumed in Washington that he would be succeeded by Stewart McDonald.

In his letter of resignation Mr. Moffett told the President that, despite necessary delays in getting the housing program under way, the housing administration was insuring construction and repair loans at the rate of $60,000,000 a month.

Proper Seating Will Help Keep Wholesome Posture

"If posture is not comfortable it is not good, and a chair that does not make good posture comfortable is not a good chair," declares Henry Eastman Bennett in "Toward an Upsitting Generation," an article in Hygeia in which he gives the essentials of good posture and describes a study of proper seating in the schools.

Good posture is essentially relaxed. As soon as one loses the balance of erectness one can sustain oneself only by strain on the back muscles against an adverse leverage, which increases as the degree of stoop increases until one is actually hanging by the back muscles and leaning on the viscera. This is both fatiguing and unwholesome.

A simple posture test for a seat is to sit as far back in it as you can and relax against the back. If there is the slightest tendency either to slide forward on the seat or to pitch forward at the shoulders it will require an increasingly hard fight against gravity to maintain erect posture in it.

SYNOPSIS

Following his father's bitter criticism of his idle life, and the withdrawal of financial assistance, Hal Ireland, only son of a wealthy banker, finds himself practically without funds but with the promise of a situation in San Francisco, which city he must reach, from New York, within a definite time limit. He takes passage with a cross-country auto party on a "share expense" basis. With five other members of the party, an attractive girl, Barry Trafford; middle-aged Giles Kerrigan; Sister Anastasia, a nun; and an individual whom he instinctively dislikes, Martin Crack, he starts his journey. Barry's reticence annoys him. To Kerrigan he takes at once, but he is unable to shake off a feeling of uneasiness. He distrusts Crack, although finding his intimacy with Kerrigan ripening, and he makes a little progress with Barry. Through a misunderstanding, at a stopping place, Hal is directed to Barry's room, instead of his own.

Alarm—of a curiously profound and quiet kind—deepened the clarity of her look as she got up, turning one hand against her breast to hide her crumpled handkerchief. Her golden hair was as Hal had hoped: the burnished vigor of it flowed through full, deliberate waves to end in a rich thicket of half-curls, their rioting simply disciplined at the edges of her smoothly modeled cheeks. There was new, mature loveliness in her straight young body—under deep-green satin, fitted to her firm waist, spreading to a full skirt, and tapered above to her straight shoulders.

The splendor of what he saw, without moving his look from the deep alarm of her eyes, seemed to check the running of his blood in that silent moment—like the shadow of shock. And he heard himself say, very gravely: "I—I'm sorry. She told me this was my room. She must have thought . . ." It wasn't important enough to finish in the expectant silence between them, round them, full in the room.

"It's all right," said Barry, her low voice coming with reluctance.

Something made him say, quietly, respectfully, "I'm sorry you've been crying."

The alarm stayed in her eyes—not a replenished thing, more like a solemn moment of it fixed there over the later business of her erect head. She might not have heard him, except that her voice said hurriedly, "That's all right, too."

They stood looking at each other, and new rounds of silence crept close into the room. She was waiting for him to go. Hal knew he must turn and walk out at the door; and he must do this before the slow, strong force gathering somewhere deep in him showed itself in his enchanted eyes, before it unlocked his resolution, loosed the warm words that already stirred at his tongue. It was a race between his lagging command to still limbs, that they move, and a hot, headless authority careering forward to take charge of blood and flesh and hurl mind away, like a dried rag, toward the morning.

He made his legs move him. And, slowly, they moved him to her, her awed watching of his eyes unchanged, the carriage of her glinting head fearless. His arms slipped round her, under her own, and as he drew her firm, satin warmth toward him, her hands went up to his shoulders and over them. She made a small sound of weariness; her eyes closed; her lovely head turned so that her lips—warm and soft and sure of grandeur—came under his.

It was probably a long time they stood there close together, without speaking, resting almost as part of each other in the silence that had grown enormous around them in the room. Once Barry took her generous lips slowly away and pressed her golden head to his shoulder; but when he moved his mouth along the faintly fragrant smoothness of her hair, she turned her lips up again—confident, grateful, credulous. Only her eyes, before they closed, were neither confident nor credulous—still held in awe, they were, still near in the fringes of alarm.

In the pregnant hugeness that blotted away the four walls, Hal felt an excitement of silent rushing—not so much that they were being flung upward alone, as that the whole silence that marooned them there was being rushed on through surely gathered speeds toward some explosive, brilliant revelation. And as his will to lose himself in this enormous and imminent beauty flooded toward whole possession of his senses, one stubborn, small agent of reason tried more frantically to make him do what he had to do. Get out, get out, get out: it came around across his attention again and again, fainter and fainter, until suddenly it took ridiculous command and his hands went to Barry's straight, firm shoulders.

She looked up at once, and the alarm was conquered in her courageous eyes. Quietly and as if to herself, she said, "You're pretending. And I am. I'm not in love with you. I'm not falling in love with you."

She took a step backward, and his hands dropped down to hold hers.

He knew that command of his reason was for a moment only; the sudden calm on him now was not to be trusted, not to be found again if he let his tongue, his blood, his whole spirit run out in their hot importunities.

Their hands slipped apart. He saw the reluctance of that in her solemn eyes, and saw that she watched it in his, too. The sound of his voice was as if he hadn't used it for a long while when, with a short, hampered turning of his head, he said, "Good G—d, this is no place to talk about anything." He moved to the door, as if he must leave the best part of himself behind, with her. He was leaving something, surely; something sank down out of him with a slow, mocking glitter, like a silver plate dropped in a pool. If this was a decent thing he did, there was no bravery in it, since he did it like a fool. The only conscious bravery he could effect now, with the bolt shot back and his hand on the doorknob, was to look at her again. Doctor Caligari jumped his forepaws up on Hal's leg; Hal put his hand to the terrier's woolly head and turned.

She stood there with her chin raised a little, as if she had just shaken back the full, glinting richness of her hair—her hands behind her back, one knee bent so that there was a suggestion of her straight leg in the sheen of the satin. The courage of her eyes, watching him, was solemn, deep, and darkly clear; but that very courage added to her air of loneliness. The unshielded light was merciless upon the ill-chosen, worn furnishings around her in the room. And she stood there—straight, beyond common loveliness—and watched him leaving her as if she were sending him away.

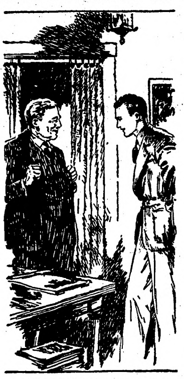
"Good night," he said, and it sounded utterly casual.

Her frank lips, which already he couldn't believe had been under his, moved over a "Good night" which he didn't hear. He swung the door open and went out, down into the dark house, past hope of sleep for the confusion into which his thoughts and feelings and desires had been so abruptly tumbled.

CHAPTER V

Friday

Sleep trapped him as that confusion had—without warning. And he woke with a start that nearly slid him off the horsehair sofa. Fresh sunlight blazed into his face through the fern-hung bow-window, and he wasn't sure where he was at all, only that he was wide awake and filled with a fine, sourceless joy for the day and for something that had happened. He lay happily for a moment while the circumstances of his being here found themselves in his head.



Kerrigan's Look Was Amused and Curious. "Like the Bottom of a Stove."

First remembering the transport of Barry's sheer loveliness in his arms, he stretched himself luxuriously, a bath of rich content tingling through his body. He snapped off his stretching suddenly to look at his watch, but his wide smile remained. Think of feeling so well at quarter past five.

But what the dickens had been all the trouble last night? All that momentous entanglement with chivalry and speechlessness, just because the break had come before he had expected it? He had done a very sound thing: he had saved himself from a premature enthusiasm that would have mixed up the rest of the trip a good deal; but there was nothing so very momentous about it. It was enough for one evening to see her defenses go down; her trust of him, taken slowly, would be more certain. Five more days coming, at least; it would have been very disappointing to forget the job of chastisement he had to do—go off the deep end at the first drop of the hat that way. Yet there he'd been so off his guard as to make emotional difficulties about leaving her room, as barely to hold himself from charging in against that remark of hers about not loving him. And outside her room, even, the sudden, restive creaking of an old house in the dark had. . . .

He got to his feet and breathed deeply, as if the contained, dusty air of the room were that of a mountain pasture in spring. Somewhere in the upper regions an alarm clock went off into its persistent rattle, and there was distant, occasional bumping to stir the slumber of the house. When he came back to the hall he found Kerrigan fumbling at the chains and bolts of the great front door.

"Well, sir—of all people," said Kerrigan, his ruddy, well-scrubbed face held by quiet concern. "A good morning to you. Thought you were lost—probably been locked out."

"I got in late," said Hal, feeling his blandness penetrated by that brown, scholarly look. "She showed me the wrong room; so I slept in there."

"You slept in there?" Kerrigan said curiously.

"Yes," said Hal quickly. "Why?"

"Then that can't be the room the trains run through," said Kerrigan, gratified. "Must be the kitchen. Didn't you hear 'em?"

"No," said Hal, laughing.

"Let me tell you if every train't charged through here was hauling pay load, stocks are a buy at any price. Gad, sir, they were on five-minute headway all night and on their way somewhere. Only trouble, they wasted a lot of steam whistling for the pantry door. If I slept here once more, I could get a dispatcher's job on the division. I only missed the number on one train: that was because I was scared his backwash was going to suck the bedclothes off me. And you slept." A twinkle grew behind the false moroseness of the brown eyes. "Whose room did she try to stick you in?"

"I don't know," said Hal. "Didn't wait to find out."

Kerrigan watched him an extra instant, then dismissed the last of his concern. "How's your body?" he said.

"Fine," said Hal. "Gosh—well, fine, as I said. How's yours?"

Kerrigan's look was amused and curious. "Like the bottom of a stove."

"And that's how?"

"Grate," said Kerrigan. "Come on, let's go out and have a snort of the ay em."

Hal was up on the widow's walk stowing luggage when Barry come out the door—refreshed, immaculate, fully awake. He watched her look into the new morning, draw a breath of it, then turn and say something smiling and quiet to Sister Anastasia, the rich slick of gold under her hat-brim gleaming. She didn't look for him nor show any trace of consciousness that he might be there, and Hal smiled to himself as he drew an end of the lashing round the rail.

He stayed on the roof purposely until she should get in. She came toward the car without looking up; and when she was close under him at the door, he said, "Hello there," in low pleasure. She glanced at him then, as if she had to see him before she knew who had spoken. "Hello," she said pleasantly, echoed nothing but the same pleasant hello. Then she got in.

Even as his smile widened, Hal's memory hurried back to last night to make certain there was nothing he'd overlooked. It was she who'd made it so serious, her eyes held in alarm, her head carried as if there were something to be brave about. Well, said Hal to himself, ignoring a certain inconclusion about it: I can pretend nothing's happened, too; but you can't make it a fact by pretending, my beauty.

He was about to vault down from the roof when something drew his eyes to the high stoop. Crack stood there, drowsing in his amiable half-dream of something satisfactory and private as he hoped for Hal's look. The golf ball gave a short leap from his idle hand and fell back into it.

"Morning," said Hal, and swung himself to the ground.

"Mornin'," said Crack quietly. "Sleep good?"

"Fine, thanks," said Hal. "You?"

"Fine, thanks," said Crack.

Listen, d—n it, Hal charged himself: there's no special meaning in that tone of his; it's just his way of saying things. "Good," he said aloud, without looking at Crack. If the man did know already by his own devices that Hal hadn't slept in a bed, what was there in it to amuse him so shyly?

* * * * * * *

The river beside the road was flat and leisurely; leisure in the slow little veins and eddies that slid under the overhanging weeds of the bank and leisure in the tall trees that stood still above their own unfocused reflections. They had run along some twenty smooth miles when Barry's voice came low, slow, sure, and Hal listened to the measures of it without especially heeding the words. She said, "That sign said ten miles to Logansport; that might be the very place for breakfast."

Hal thought of her as he had left her last night, head up, hands behind her back, one satin leg a little bent; and he remembered suddenly that she had been crying when he came in. The memory pricked him—like the quick recollection of a promised kindness which it is too late to perform. He pressed the accelerator nearer the floor—possessed by a tentative hurry to see if her expression was clear of the remembered loneliness, to make sure she had nothing to do with the uncertainly hushed sense of something ill that had seemed to travel with them.

They drew up before the shining white-tile lunchroom toward which Mrs. Pulsipher had thrown a yelp of hungry approval, and Hal slid out to stand by the door. Barry leaned forward to get up, and Doctor Caligari, held in the crook of her arm, was brought closer to Crack for a moment than he seemed to like; he bared his teeth over an ugly, rising growl. "Doc!" she said in quick censure. Hal took the dog from her. And when he met her eyes, they had in them the hurried end of last night's solemn alarm.

D—n it, I don't want her to take back what she said, Hal told himself inside his closed mouth: I don't want her to be in love with me. All I want is . . .

Peninsular War Relics

Workmen have discovered heirlooms believed to have been hidden by Queen Carlotta Joaquina of Portugal to save them from looters during the French occupation of Lisbon in the Peninsular War of 1808-14. The men were installing electric lights in the ancient royal palace at Queluz, and found the heirlooms behind a panel in the wall of Queen Carlotta's bedroom.

One of the articles, an exquisitely worked altar crucifix of solid silver, weighs more than ten pounds. There are also six altar candlesticks of silver. All the articles belong to the period of King John V, 1706-1750.

Eternity

Eternity is not a very, very long time, but the absence of time.

Long Time Between Drinks for Many Hawaiian Cows

Reports on cattle in Hawaii that do not drink water for long periods are verified by a representative of the bureau of animal industry, United States Department of Agriculture, in Honolulu, who tells of a number of cases where ranch cattle in the dry regions get along for months in spite of the lack of streams, springs, water holes, and artificial water supplies. The animals get the needed moisture from the succulent leaves of cactus or other plants, from dew and rain on leaves, and from occasional small pools that remain after rain.

There have been stories that some of these cattle refuse to drink water from a pool or tank and that they are even afraid of water. The bureau man reports that ranchers do not corroborate such statements. Ranchers say that cattle find pools often enough so that they are acquainted with the appearance of water in that form.

On one large ranch on the Island of Hawaii, only 6 inches of rain fell in 1933 instead of the usual 20 to 40 inches. The cattle were turned in on a large cactus area where there was no available water except that in the plants, and very few deaths of animals were reported.

Hawks Battle Rescuer

Running to the rescue of a lamb being attacked by two hawks near Gunnindaddy, New South Wales, M. Doyle, a farmer, had to fight for his life. As he approached the lamb one bird swooped savagely at him. Doyle stunned it with the handle of his whip. Seeing its mate on the ground the second hawk dropped its prey and attacked Doyle. The man swung his whip and the lash coiled around the bird's legs. A sharp jerk brought it to the ground. Both birds were killed.

Safetygrams

BY FRED W. BRAUN
The Safety Man

A nice bit of encouraging news -- there were fewer deaths over the Labor Day week-end in 1935 due to automobile accidents than in 1934.

This should be comforting and encouraging to all of us, because we should all be interested in reducing this terrible slaughter.

All accidents can be avoided. The recklessness of some people should be curbed by a very rigid enforcement of traffic laws. Judges should develop backbone and gumption enough to enforce the laws pertaining to traffic, regardless of any political consequences. Their duty and obligation to the people should be a primary consideration.

Where there is strict enforcement of traffic codes, a proper safety educational campaign among the driving citizens, the results are astonishing. Look at Milwaukee. This is again the first, nationally, to establish a fine record in the reduction of automobile deaths and accidents.

It can be done, but you must help.

Save Green Tomatoes

The wise gardner beats Jack Frost to her green tomatoes, says Miss Inez Hobart, xetension nutritionist, University Farm, St. Paul. In September, when frost threatens some chilly night it is safer to pick the green tomatoes which fit into almost any recipe in place of ripe tomatoes. And they make other good dishes of their own. Green tomatoes are considered good vitamin food and have much the same delicious flavor as ripe tomatoes, but are slightly more acid.

Here are some ways in which either green or ripe tomatoes may be prepared. The most common method is stewed; or try making tomate soup with green tomatoes. It will be a delicate green instead of the usual pink. Sliced fried tomatoes dipped in egg and bread crumbs are delicious. Some special uses for green tomatoes are green tomato pickle, green tomate marmalade, and one of the best - green tomato mincemeat. The skin of green tonatoes may be loosened for peeling by dipping them in boiling water for a moment, just as is done with ripe ones.

A good recipe for cream tomato soup is: Cook green tomatoes until tender - seive; make a thin white sauce, season with salt and pepper. Add hot sieved tomato juice to white sauce, gradually, stirring constantly. Use about one-fourth to one-third of a cup of green tomato juice to 1 cup white sauce.

Will Relocate Settlers

J. W. Taylor of the resettlement administration and project manager of the Beltrami and Pine Island Forests located at Baudette has been temporarily assigned to Thief River Falls to assist in developing a program to relocate settlers who reside in the Mud Lake area.

Mr. Taylor has already moved about 60 of the 420 settlers in the Forests to new locations. He will have his office in the auditorium at Thief River Falls.

The Resettlement administration will assist the settlers in moving and financing the purchase of new farms wnich repayments will be made over a long period at a low rate of interest.

The settlers will select their own farm and communities in which they wish to locate and the administration will approve approve of each purchase where finances are needed, as to soil, drainage, community development, schools etc.

Considerable good productive lands can be bought at low prices in both Marshall and Pennington couuties. No doubt most of the settlers will relocate close to the Mud Lake area.

Try To Stop Lake Project

Unless solicitation of cases among land owners involved in the Mud Lake game refuge condemnation is stopped immediately, disbarment proceedings will be instituted against attorneys doing the soliciting, Attorney General Harry H. Peterson declared. The state has considerable evidence of solicitation by 11 attorneys, indicating that owners are contesting appraisals in courts because of agitation by lawyers, Mr. Peterson said. The solicitation is being done in violation of the law and of the code of ethics, he said.

Mr. Peterson stressed the desire of the state to deal generously with the land owners and conceded they have a right to obtain legal counsel if they desire to do so. Systematic solicitation, such as apparently has taken place, is clearly improper, he said.

The condemnation involves about 600 land owners, and contemplates acquisition by the state of 53,000 acres of land for sale to the government. A $5,000,000 development will be carried out with federal funds.

To permit owners to make direct contact with the state legal department the attorney general has opened offices at Thief River Falls Monday, with David Erickson, deputy attorney general, and Armond Brattland and O. J. Bundlie, assistants, in charge.

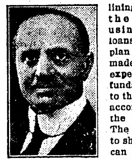
THE FARM BUDGET

By DAN H. OTIS,
Agricultural Director, American Bankers Association

Inventories aid in the formation of a farm budget. Some banks, as well as the Farm Credit Administration, recommend outlining in advance the method of using production loans. Under this plan provision is made for monthly expenditures and funds are granted to the borrower in accordance with the budget plan. The budget helps to show how loans can be repaid.



D. H. OTIS

With the accumulated data from previous inventories and budgets, budget making becomes easier and more accurate and valuable. As one branch of the farming plant requires more expenditure, such as for new machinery, fencing, livestock, etc., it may be necessary to limit other branches in order to meet these pressing requirements.

The budget helps to formulate a financial program. It is of special importance in arranging to meet special or large expenditures. If the income and expenditures are carefully budgeted it prevents the spending of money needed for interest and taxes before the time of their payment arrives. It helps to provide a reserve.

The Agricultural Commission of the American Bankers Association feels that this type of work is so important that special emphasis has been placed upon the field of farm inventories, budgets and credit statements as one of its national projects for farm [illegible]

Appraisors File Report

The appraisers who have spent the past few weeks checking over the land in the Mud Lake Project, filed their report of awards to the land owners on Friday. The report, which is a very large and descriptive one, was filed with Clerk of Court A. C. Swandby, Warren, and the land owners were notified that they should go there to find out how much they were to get for their real estate.

Several auto loads of farmers from the Mud Lake area went to Warren on Saturday and from what they stated when they came back here, they were very much disatified with what the appraisers had allowed them for their homes out there. A great deal of the land had been appraised at only one dollar per acre and it appears that unpaid back taxes on some of the land amounts to more than the small awards made for it.

According to reports received by us most of the land owners have hired attorneys and are filing appeals in the matter unless the state makes them a better offer before the ten days of time to appeal is up.

A certain percentage of the farmers out in the area also stated that if the state would leave them alone they would stay out there and farm as they have in the past.

CORN GIVES

"GIVE!" says the jazz band leader. "Give," says the boss—give us all you've got. Remember the song you used to sing in kindergarten, "Give, said the little stream, as it wandered down the hill"?

To give, you've got to have—whether it's a crooning radio voice or ability for work. If you have energy — then you've got something. Fred Astaire has it, so has Ginger Rogers and many another stage and screen star whose gift we are apt to sum up in one word—"personality."

Where to get it? From foods. Energy-giving foods like corn, in delicious dishes like these:

Corn and Walnut Loaf: Drain the contents of one can of No. 2 whole grain corn and run the corn through a food chopper. Add one-half cup of chopped walnuts, two beaten eggs, one-half cup milk and one-half cup crumbs. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Pour into a buttered baking dish and bake for 45 minutes in a moderate oven — 375 degrees. Serve with tomato sauce. This serves four persons.

Energy for Half a Dozen

Scalloped Corn and Celery: Bring one cup of diced celery and one-fourth cup of diced green pepper to boiling in salted water. Drain. Senator Long Assassinated by Political Opponent

HUEY P. LONG, United States senator and political dictator of Louisiana, is dead, the victim of an assassin's bullet. As he passed through a corridor of the state-house in Baton Rouge, where the legislature was passing more laws to solidify his control over the state, he was shot once through the body by Dr. Carl A. Weiss, Jr., of Baton Rouge, one of the "Kingfish's" political opponents. The assassin was immediately shot to death by the senator's ever present bodyguards.

Huey P. Long

Long was hurriedly taken to a hospital and eminent surgeons were summoned. They found the bullet had gone through the base of the right lung and passed out of the back, puncturing the colon and causing internal hemorrhage. After the wound had been cleansed, two blood transfusions were given, the blood being supplied by Lieut. Gov. James A. Noe. Mrs. Long and her daughter Rose were brought from New Orleans and sat at the senator's bedside.

The surgeons and physicians worked unceasingly to save Long, but his strength steadily waned and shortly after 4 o'clock Tuesday morning, about thirty hours after the shooting, he passed away.

The motive of Doctor Weiss, an eye, ear, nose and throat specialist, apparently grew out of the high-handed political methods of Senator Long in Louisiana. The position of his father-in-law, District Judge B. H. Pavy of Opelousas parish, an anti-Long leader, is jeopardized by a law introduced in the present special session to gerrymander his district. The law would put the home of Judge Pavy in Landry parish.

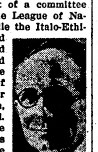
In August, Senator Long told the senate that at a conference in the Hotel De Soto in New Orleans last July 21 his foes had discussed a plot to kill him. He presented excerpts from what claimed was a record of a sound recording device revealing the plot.

Long's opponents laughed at this story, just as they always have ridiculed his practice of having an armed guard accompany him everywhere.

Political leaders of all parties expressed their deep regret for the assassination of Senator Long. His devoted followers in Louisiana and elsewhere mourned his death. He had been one of the picturesque figures in America's political life, creating innumerable enemies but persistent in advocating his ideas which appeared fantastic to most citizens. A Democrat, he had broken with the administration and often bitterly attacked President Roosevelt and the New Dealers. It was the belief of many that he intended to become the Presidential nominee of a third party comprising his own "share the wealth" crowd and various other groups dissatisfied with the policies of the old parties.

Efforts of Statesmen to Prevent War in Africa

MUSSOLINI tacitly consented to the appointment of a committee of five nations by the League of Nations council to handle the Italo-Ethiopian embroglio, and after protest agreed that Great Britain and France should be among the members of that body. The other members are Spain, Turkey and Poland. Senor Salvador de Madariaga of Spain is the chairman, and he and his associates at once began the task assigned them. Each country is represented by its chief delegate, being besides Madariaga, Eden of England, Laval of France, Rustu Arras of Turkey and Josef Beck of Poland.



Salvador de Madariaga

The assembly of the league began its sessions in Geneva, bringing to that city many of Europe's foremost statesmen, and it was a certainty that the assembly would be definitely hostile to Italy and ready to consider the imposing of penalties on Italy the moment any overt act occurs. The Italians hoped to prolong the inquiry by the committee of five until after the adjournment of the assembly, and their opponents were building up a solid front, preparing for the application of sanctions against an aggressor as provided for in article 16 of the league covenant. Baron Aloisi told Captain Eden that the African campaign would not begin while the assembly was in session.

In two speeches in Rome Mussolini gave indication that he would not be diverted from his purpose to conquer Ethiopia. Though in one he said "the Italian people want peace provided it is accompanied by justice," in the other he declared "we shall march straight on." The Ethiopian government announced that "telegrams from the northern frontier show that the Italians are making important troop movements on the Ethiopian and Eritrean frontier, indicating an early offensive against Ethiopia."

Accepting the advice of his "brain trust," which includes Everett A. Colson of the United States, Emperor Haile Selassie instructed his representatives in Geneva to reject all solutions thus far offered by the powers for settling the quarrel with Italy. These are a tripartite mandate over Ethiopia, as suggested by France, with the League of Nations guaranteeing Ethiopia's independence and territorial integrity; France's proposal for an Italian protectorate similar to that of the British in Iraq, and an international police force similar to the one that occupied the Saar before its restoration to Germany.

Aloisi Presents Italy's Case Against Ethiopia

BARON POMPEI ALOISI, cold and sardonic, stood up before the League of Nations council in Geneva and presented Italy's case against Ethiopia, denouncing that empire as utterly unworthy to be classed with civilized countries. In addition to his speech, he laid before the council a long memorandum detailing the alleged conditions of slavery that still prevail in Ethiopia and the participation of its government in the slave trade. This memorandum was elaborately documented.

Baron Aloisi

Addressing the council, Aloisi said in part:

"The Ethiopian government does nothing to make itself worthy of belonging to the community of civilized nations. Even today that country has to be represented by European advisers in order to make its voice heard in the League of Nations.

"The Italian government considers, in these circumstances, that a state such as Ethiopia cannot have either equality of right or equality of duties as compared with civilized states. To claim that members of the league are required to observe rules of the covenant in their relations with members who have always and constantly been outside those rules is contrary to all the principles of right and justice."

To the press correspondents the baron was even more explicit. "You have heard the Italian thesis," he said. "That is final. Italy has asked nothing, not even the withdrawal of Ethiopia from the league. From now on Italy will play a passive role here. We are not going to discuss anything with Ethiopia, but we will discuss Ethiopia with the league.

"It is up to the members of the league council to decide whether they want to expel Ethiopia or expel Italy."

Reactions to President's Letter Are Various

REACTION of American business and financial men to President Roosevelt's latest public statement that his basic program has reached substantial completion and industry will have a breathing spell ran the gamut between mild hope and downright unbelief. Those who permitted themselves to be quoted were generally extremely cautious in their expressions, but there was usually a vein of skepticism in their remarks. Wall Street brokers were gladdened by a spurt of trading at higher prices, but bankers were more than doubtful, and economists insisted that a balanced budget, which wasn't mentioned in the President's letter to Roy Howard, publisher, was a prime requisite.

Silas Strawn, former president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, said: "Business men generally will say that the improvement in some lines of business has been in spite of, rather than because of, the activities of the administration."

Politicians regarded the letter as Mr. Roosevelt's opening of his campaign for re-election, and praised or decried it according to their party affiliations. Frank Knox of the Chicago Daily News, a potential candidate for the Republican Presidential nomination, called it "just another promise" and set forth the many campaign promises which Mr. Roosevelt has failed to keep. Senator Black of Alabama said the statement was "a wonderfully clear explanation of his program, its original aims and its execution. It should be a call to those engaged in business to co-operate in further national progress."

Howard had written the President that many business men had become convinced that there could be no real recovery "until the fears of business have been allayed through the granting of a breathing spell to industry and a recess from further experimentation until the country can recover its losses."

In a long letter the President replied that the legislative program of his administration had reached substantial completion and "the breathing spell of which you speak is here—decidedly so."

Germany Protests Language of a New York Judge

GERMAN Ambassador Hans Luther called on Secretary of State Hull and entered formal protest against the language used by Magistrate Louis B. Brodsky of New York in dismissing charges against five persons arrested for tearing the Nazi flag from the liner Bremen in July. The magistrate justified the action of the rioters on the ground that the display of the flag carried, in their minds, "the same sinister implications of a pirate ship, sailing defiantly into the harbor of a nation, one of whose ships it had just scuttled, with the black flag of piracy proudly flying aloft."

Judge Brodsky also characterized the Nazi state as "an atavistic throwback to pre-medieval, if not barbaric, social and political conditions."

Ambassador Luther, who was acting on instructions from Berlin, must have known that Secretary Hull couldn't do much about it, having no control over a city magistrate. However, Mr. Hull tried to mollify an angered Germany by intimating to Governor Lehman of New York that an apology from Brodsky was in order.

Hundreds Die in Hurricane That Sweeps Florida

FLORIDA was the victim of another terrific hurricane that swept up from the Caribbean across the keys and the southern end of the state, then along the west coast and into Georgia. The total of fatalities was uncertain but at this writing the number of dead is estimated at more than 500. Of these perhaps 300 were war veterans in labor camps on the keys where they were employed in construction work. All buildings on many of the keys were demolished and a relief train that had been sent to take the veterans away from the danger zone was smashed to pieces. The survivors on the islands were without shelter, food and medical supplies, but relief expeditions were quickly sent by the Red Cross and other agencies.

Responding to assertions that the great loss of life in the veterans' labor camps was due to lack of preparation against such a disaster, President Roosevelt ordered a thorough investigation by Brig. Gen. Frank T. Hines, administrator of veterans' affairs. Harry Hopkins, head of the FERA which set up the camps, also started an inquiry, and so did the American Legion. The affair promised to attain the bad eminence of a national scandal.

Caught in the fury of the storm, the Morgan liner Dixie, from New Orleans for New York, was driven aground on French reef, about 60 miles south of Miami. Her passengers and crew, numbering 372, were in great peril for three days, but various steamers and coast guard cutters rushed to the rescue in response to her SOS call and as soon as wind and seas abated enough all were taken off the stranded vessel and conveyed to land, most of them to Miami. Passengers on the Dixie warmly praised the gallant work of the ship's officers and crew.

Americans Cancel Big Ethiopian Concession

WHILE the European statesmen were struggling with the Italo-Ethiopian question, Secretary of State Cordell Hull quietly took a hand in the game. He did not in any way involve the United States in the wrangle, but he put an end to the deal whereby Haile Selassie was giving a great development concession to Americans. Officials of the Standard-Vacuum Oil company went to Mr. Hull's office and admitted ownership of the grant. The secretary admonished them that the concession had been "the cause of great embarrassment not only to this government but to other governments who are making strenuous and sincere efforts for the preservation of peace."

Sec'y Hull

The oil men thereupon announced their intention of withdrawing from the deal with Ethiopia, and the big concession sensation was entirely deflated.

Bar Associations to Have Aid in Ousting Shysters

STATE and city bar associations are to be aided vigorously in their efforts to rid the profession of shysters by the American Bar association, and President William L. Ransom has appointed Robert T. McCracken of Philadelphia chairman of a new committee to direct the work. Mr. McCracken performed a similar task for the Philadelphia bar. He is a member of the law firm of Montgomery & McCracken, of which Associate Justice Owen J. Roberts was a member before his elevation to the United States Supreme court.

Death of Edward L. Doheny, Rich Oil Magnate

EDWARD L. DOHENY, one of the wealthiest of America's oil magnates, died in Los Angeles at the age of seventy-nine years, after a long illness. His oil interests were mainly in California and Mexico. In 1924 Doheny and his old friend, Albert B. Fall, secretary of the interior under Harding, were involved in the investigation of the government's leasing of the Elk Hills naval oil reserve in California to Doheny for exploitation.

Doheny was twice tried and twice acquitted, on charges of conspiracy to defraud the government and of giving a bribe of $100,000 to Fall. The latter, however, was found guilty of taking a bribe and went to prison.

Minneapolis—The works progress administration and the Minnesota department of conservation plan to spend about $1,500,000 on statewide water conservation projects, Conservation Commissioner E. V. Willard said. A total of 173 individual projects representing the most comprehensive public water conservation program in the history of the state has been approved by the war department. The law taxed the "intangible assets" of a corporation; technically, the difference between the market value of the corporation's stock and the actual value of its physical assets. Minneapolis—Minnesota will have 310,000 persons on direct relief by early winter, L. P. Zimmerman, acting SERA director said in pointing to the situation faced by municipalities and the state as a result of federal withdrawal from the direct relief field. Zimmerman estimated that it will require $2,500,000 to cover relief costs in October, $3,000,000 in November and $4,000,000 in December, and pointed out that unless the federal government comes to the aid of the municipalities, a serious situation will result.

ROMAN COINS TELL HISTORY

The first Roman coins were cast about the middle of the Third century, B. C. They were of bronze, generally showing the prow of a ship on the reverse and heads of various divinities on the obverse. The "as" or "aes," one pound of bronze, was the unit of the Roman mint and its multiples and parts formed the Roman coinage. The value was placed on both sides in different manners. The mark of value of the "as" was 1. Its type was the head of Janus. The letter "S" indicated the value of the semis, four globules the sextans and one globule the unica. These were all parts of the "as," the unica being about one-twelfth.

SYNOPSIS

Following his father's bitter criticism of his idle life, and the withdrawal of financial assistance, Hal Ireland, only son of a wealthy banker, finds himself practically without funds but with the promise of a situation in San Francisco, which he must reach, from New York, within a definite time limit. He takes passage with a cross-country auto party on a "share expense" basis. With five other members of the party, an attractive girl, Barry Trafford; middle-aged Giles Kerrigan; Sister Anastasia, a nun; and an individual whom he instinctively dislikes, Martin Crack, he starts his journey. Barry's reticence annoys him. To Kerrigan he takes at once, but he is unable to shake off a feeling of uneasiness. He distrusts Crack, although finding his intimacy with Kerrigan ripening, and he makes a little progress with Barry. Through a misunderstanding, at a stopping place, Hal is directed to Barry's room, instead of his own. Propinquity seems to soften Barry's unfriendliness, and they exchange kisses.

Crack gave an uncomfortable laugh as he got out, and a faint blush deepened his old-fashioned youthfulness. "I guess that pup don't like me so very well," he said. He smiled shyly at Hal, as if half-hoping for some other explanation from him; but then his eyes drifted lazily away again, undisappointed.

The morning lay hot and long over the flat croplands of Indiana and Illinois. As Rasputin sang along the road past farm and field and farm, through brief brick towns, noon-drowsy and unbustled, the land kept the character of things it knew, the assurance of things it remembered. Hal's sense of these quickened sometimes to Kerrigan's remark and implication, sometimes to untried appreciations of his own—not so much forgotten as never before found.

Rasputin ran like an aristocrat, granting an aristocrat the privilege of metallic song in the gearbox and a disinclination to compete with low-price upstarts at a change of traffic light. And before Mrs. Pulsipher could come to the fidgeting preliminaries of lunch-hunger, they were crossing the Illinois river into Peoria.

Barry saw the sign on a cafeteria in a side street, "Air Cooled and Conditioned." And there was a chorus of grateful exclamation and a struggling into jackets as the almost-chilled draft swept up the stairway. Down in the bright bustle of the cafeteria itself, Sister Anastasia suddenly sneezed, then looked at Barry with a pretty expression halfway between amusement and apology. Barry's hand went to her arm, her clear face lighted with quick, humorous sympathy. Kerrigan took the dead cigarette from his lips and, with an air of awkward courtliness upon his bulk, said to her, "We'll all catch the Russian grippe in here. Sister, allow me to take you somewhere else."

"Oh no—thahnk you," said Sister Anastasia, her eyes grateful and still amused, her diction trying carefully to elude the accent that touched it.

It was an enchanting voice—in its gentleness of grace and inner assurance that still, as Barry had said, kept you from using the word humble. Hal smiled in pleasure as he watched her. And since Barry would not meet his eyes—not actually avoiding them but seeming to know of no use in meeting them—he had double welcome for an impulsive tenderness, brought his tray of lunch to the empty place beside the nun.

She spoke only when she was spoken to; but the restrained ease of what she said, the smooth, quiet cadence she gave to each sentence made it delightful to go on prompting her. They talked of nothing much that Hal remembered clearly; how long she had been in America, the pleasures and imperfections of crossing the ocean, the view from the Empire State building, the world eminence of American cities in degree of summer heat. And then Hal had an innocent, urgent desire to see her blush—a little, once, to see what she might have been like as a young girl with a first beau. And he said:

"Have you heard, Sister, that California is a place where the fruit has no flavor, the flowers no scent, and the ladies no charm?"

"No," she said, looking at him in guileless interest. "I 'ave not 'eurd that. Is it true?"

"I don't know surely, because I've never been there," said Hal, without concealing his pleasure in her. "I've tasted oranges from there which were sweet; and I've been told that their orange blossoms at least have the scent they do in other places. As for the last part of the saying, I know it will not be true when you and Miss Trafford get to California."

For an instant Hal was afraid he would have to be ashamed of himself: Sister Anastasia glanced quickly away; but then he saw she was looking toward the other end of the table where Barry sat, her head turned from them, intent upon whatever Kerrigan was telling her. The nun turned to him again, a contained, soft smiling in her look.

"It is a long time since I 'ave 'eurd anything like that," she said in tranquil simplicity. She looked down at her plate, and Hal's pleasure leapt for the faint running-up of warmth under her cool, immaculate cheeks. Then she said, very softly, "Miss Trafford is beautiful—inside, too."

* * * * * * *

Hal was two places behind Barry in the line at the cashier's window. A spectacular woman, past her twenties, leaned beside it, waiting until the cashier should be free again. She wanted a spotlight to tone down the heavy mascara on her eyelashes, the bold make-up of her lips, the revealing tightness of her bright dress. She watched Barry steadily, unwary of being caught: her resentful eyes moved from detail to detail, rapidly calculating the composition of each effect; her petulant mouth, loosely at rest, indicated neither approval nor envy. Hal was watching the woman's whole, unconscious interest when Barry paid her check.

Barry looked down at Doctor Caligari, flicked his leash to start him up, then raised her deliberate glance to the woman's face and smiled. Hal could see Barry's profile, clear and candid, as she spoke her low, friendly "Hullo." The woman's sullen eyes cheered quickly and artless dimples came at once beside her efficient smile. As if she recognized Barry, she said, "Hello, cuteness."

"Hot out," said Barry.

"Hot is right," said the woman. "Keep outa the sun."

"Will," said Barry, a quiet sort of thanks in her smiling; and her easy, long-legged walk took her toward the door, the woman's look following her in contented approval.

Now why did she do that? Hal asked himself in uninvited, consciously unreasonable irritation.

He caught up with her outside the door to the street that seemed baked, not only by the sun but by a fanatic furnace just under the pavement, too.

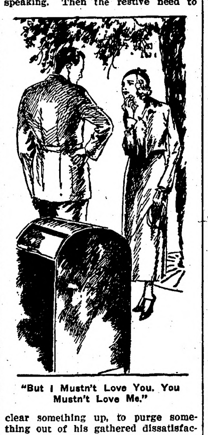
"Going to walk the Doctor, or sit in the car?" he said.

"Walk," said Barry, hardly looking at him.

With a single, mirthless laugh at the beginning, he said, "D'you rather I sat in the car till you're finished?"

She looked at him as if she hadn't quite caught his meaning. "Come if you like," she said.

They walked toward the principal street and turned into it—without speaking. Then the restive need to clear something up, to purge something out of his gathered dissatisfaction, took sudden charge of his tongue and he said, "Barry, I want to talk to you." And the pointlessness of that was apparent to him even before he'd finished.



"But I Mustn't Love You. You Mustn't Love Me."

"All right," she said inconsequently. "What about?"

"Not on the main street of Peoria at two o'clock in the afternoon," he said.

"Why not?"

"You know d—n well why not."

Barry looked at him unsympathetically but without anger, and her low, steady voice said, "In the first place, I wouldn't've asked if I knew why not, and in the second place, throwing d—ns around doesn't help me understand you."

"Oh h—l," said Hal, more in vague disgust with himself than anything else.

"That's not necessary, either," she said.

"Barry, what's the matter?"

"Not a darn thing—with me," she said.

"Oh," he said; and they walked for another ten paces or so of silence. Then, as an accusation, he said to her, "You didn't know that woman—that woman you spoke to down there. Why did you speak to her?"

Barry waited an instant before she said, still not turning to him, "Because I liked her looks; because some day I may have to put up with what she has to put up with... and I hope people speak to me without thinking they're smart, or wanting something."

"Barry!" said Hal, in the quick authority he would have used for the dog.

"You asked me," said Barry. Her eyes and brows disclaimed responsibility for his reaction. "I supposed you wanted me to tell you."

"Barry," said Hal with forced restraint, "tell me something else. Is last night gone clean out of your head? Did it mean nothing to you after I'd left"—and he added with not wholly convincing bitterness—"like an idiot."

She looked round at him, the clean, long arches of her eyebrows raised. Then, not as a question but ironically, to be sure that's what he'd said, she repeated, "Like an idiot."

He watched her without speaking, almost wishing her eyes would at least do him the small honor of anger or defiance, not stay in their cool, remote composure that had nothing, one way or the other, to do with him. Then, just as some change began somewhere deep in her blue look, she turned her head and seemed to walk a little faster, as if she saw where she had to go.

Hal looked ahead too and said, with dissatisfied assurance, "I didn't mean 'like an idiot' and you know it."

He thought it was because her ankle had started to turn that her shoulder came lightly against him. But then her hand caught his, brought it halfway up, and pressed the back of it briefly against her jacket, over her heart, before she gave it back to him. And still she looked straight before her—a grave look, at nothing that was in the street ahead.

In the calm knowledge that flashed into abrupt, reckless command of his spirit, that then indeed became his spirit, his whole living conviction, he stopped her walking with his hand at her elbow. She let her body half turn to his hold of her, but not her head. That didn't matter: she would turn her face to him in another sure, plain moment. "Barry," he said, "I love you. You know that, too."

She glanced down at Doctor Caligari, as if she were trying to think of something that would show how sorry she was for him. And when slowly she faced Hal at last, her eyes were soft with grieving helplessness.

"I didn't make you say that," she said quietly. "I didn't want you to. Dear God! why did you have to say that?"

"Because I meant it," he told her, strength from extravagant stores running up to help him pierce most deeply with the bright rapier of his knowledge. "Because I'm too full of it to wait one more second of loneliness to tell you in every, sharp, desperate way there is that I love you, Barry—love you, love you. Barry—oh, blast Peoria and all its sunlight!"

When he broke off, she looked down at his mouth, then back into his eyes, her look wondering, incredulous, young in its bafflement before something not to be understood at once, mature in its certainty that all the pain was yet to be counted.

"Darling," she said softly, just to say it under his watching. Then, more strongly: "Darling, I can't love you. I mustn't. That's true, true—even if I'd—I'd give my eyes not to have it. I'll tell you why—truly; and you'll see. But I have to wait till I know how to tell you. I promise, my dearest, I shall know. But I mustn't love you. You mustn't love me." She looked at him as if she had known him very well and he were now suddenly going to leave her.

Then quickly her eyes left his and she turned around, drawing at Doc's leash. "We must go back, Hal," she said hurriedly. "Please, we've got to."

They were on the heat-shimmered road again by three, a hundred miles from the Mississippi crossing. There was a current of gaiety which carried off even the standard post-luncheon torpor, as if the atmosphere of the car were infected by the profligate, exulting buoyancy under Hal's own heart.

For Hal could dismiss the conviction of grief in Barry's eyes for his joy in the small marvels of their passage in the street; the quick touching of her shoulder to his arm; the pressure of her living side against the back of his caught hand; the near-husky enchantment in her calling him darling. What could she have behind her blue eyes to stand against his invincibility? Some fragile shadow of an obstacle—the fact that he was Frederick Ireland's son, or the beckoning of Hollywood; trifles which he could shatter when he had his time to speak, out of the strength which she herself had unleashed to surge up under the single necessity left in the world.

The time was coming—today, as swiftly as the hard road under Rasputin's wheels. Excitement filled him, pushed newly in each moment to escape his chest; and there was room for no more than a flash of shame at the niggardliness of his spirit that had quibbled with his being most valiantly in love, for the first—good G—d, yes, the first real time in his life.

The little bridge-sign announcing Kickapoo creek, made him chuckle with pleasure; and when he glanced at Kerrigan, he put no restraint on his affectionate comfort in being here beside him.

"Hey, my frand," said Kerrigan, bending gravely toward him, "where did you go in Peoria?"

"Why, Colonel?" said Hal, grinning.

"You look as though you'd slipped on a million dollars' worth of eternal verities and found your initials stamped on all of 'em."

"Little place around the corner I found on my way home from the Klondike," said Hal. "Run by an ex-aide-de-camp to the czar whose life I saved at Port Arthur. Napoleon brandy from original casks at a nickel a goblet. I've no secrets from you, Munchausen."

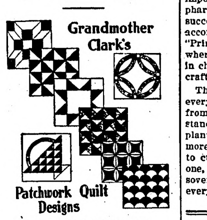
Old Fashioned Patchwork Quilts



By GRANDMOTHER CLARK

From all indications quilt makers will be busy this winter making more quilts. Quilts are still very attractive for needle workers, and any suggestion on this work will be welcomed.

Patchwork Quilt making is much easier today than during Colonial days. Patches are more easily obtained. Diagrams and cutouts for patches and books of instruction are printed. All of these make the work easier and more quilts are being made.

Grandmother Clark's Book No. 20 on Patchwork Quilts contains 30 quilts with cutting diagram for patches, also several ways to assemble 12 and 18-inch quilt blocks.

This book contains information and diagrams for the quilts shown above and many other old designs. Send us 15 cents for this book No. 20 and receive it by mail.

Dynamite

In Fort Myers, Fla., O. J. Hall, fifty-one, superintendent of a light and power company, placed a stick of dynamite in his mouth and lighted the fuse. It blew his head to bits.

In Estherville, Iowa, Burt Bloom, sixty, retired farmer, placed dynamite in a rock bed, lighted a fuse and stood back. Nothing happened. Bloom waited. At last he cautiously approached the charge. As he bent over the dynamite exploded and killed him.

MEDICINE AMONG THE ZULUS

Superstition seems to be the most important ingredient of the Zulu pharmacopeia and may explain the success of many of their remedies, according to Raymond B. Cowles, "Primitive Medicine" in Hygeia where he discusses the Zulu's faith in charms, countercharms and witchcraft.

The Zulus have a remedy for every ill. They choose their cures from inorganic and organic substances, selecting freely from both plant and animal life. Many of the more potent remedies are supposed to cure not one but many evils and one, at least, is supposed to be a sovereign remedy with power over every known disease.

Safetygrams
BY FRED W. BRAUN
The Safety Man

Manufacturers are improving cars every year. Highway Departments of all states are improving roads. But the human being does not want to be improved in his ability to drive and walk carefully.

People are still trying to compete with trains at railroad crossings.

Many motorists still claim the right of way after an accident.

Many motorists still insist that they can pass other cars on hills, curves, and dangerous crossings.

So many motorists feel that after they once start to cross an intersection the pedestrian has absolutely no right.

The improvement in cars and highways goes on but just because the horse power in an automobile is increased does not justify the decrease in horse sense.

It's up to the individual when he takes hold of that wheel to drive safely and to drive courteously.

Victor Lorentson of Lakeville came Sunday for hunting and a visit at the Sam Lorentson home.

Beautifying Roadsides

Recognizing the growing interest in roadside beautification in Minnesota, the state highway department is offering the services of its roadside development division to civic groups and individuals interested in improving the appearance of property fronting on trunk highways, according to a department bulletin.

"Experts in the department will be glad to offer suggestions for the screening or elimination of eyesores along the highways' or for other types of beautification," N. W. Elsberg, highway commissioner, announced.

"As a great tourist state, Minnesota wishes to make the best possible impression on visitors. Our natural scenic advantages are great, but often an otherwise beautiful bit of country is spoiled by some man-made eyesore which could easily be blotted out at little or no cost by proper plantings. The highway department itself has, of course' been an offender against beauty, but it is now erasing construction scars and is giving serious attention to the prerervation of natural attractions. Private individuals and groups can be of great assistance in this effort to make our highways avenues of beauty as well as utility.

"Country school houses, farmsteads and village or city residential properties facing on the highways lend themselves particularly well to beautification by individual or co-operative effort"

Hartley Peterson, Ludvig Larson, and Clarence Larson and son Chester made a business trip to Warren on Monday.

MIXED VEGETABLES

The More The Merrier

GOOD vegetables are so good that we want all we can get of them. Our systems want them—our health demands them.

Which is all very nice for everybody except the one who stays in the kitchen to shell peas, string beans, scrape carrots and husk corn. It is very nice to know, then, that you can buy canned mixed vegetables all ready to serve hot with butter, or to toss into a crisp salad, or into a puffy tender omelet melting with goodness. You'll like them prepared in such ways as these:

Full of Vitamins

Vegetable Spanish Rice: Cut two slices of bacon in small squares and fry. Remove from the fat and then sauté one cup of mixed vegetables which have been drained (and the liquor reserved) in the bacon fat for a few minutes. Then add the vegetable liquor and one and one-half cups of tomatoes. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Simmer for a few minutes. Add two-thirds cup rice which has been boiled and drained, and pour into a baking dish. Cover with one-fourth cup grated cheese and bake for twenty-five to thirty minutes in a 375 degree oven. This serves six persons.

Vegetable Omelet: Make a French omelet using four eggs, one-half teaspoon salt, a few grains of pepper and four tablespoons milk. Meanwhile have ready a white sauce made with one tablespoon butter, one tablespoon flour and three-fourths cup of milk. Add one cup of canned mixed vegetables which have been drained, season with salt and pepper and heat thoroughly. Spread this over half the omelet just before folding. This serves four persons.

Quick Vegetable Soup: Simmer one slice of onion with one cup of canned tomatoes for five minutes. Press through a sieve. Add the contents of one can of consommé, one cup of canned mixed vegetables and one cup of water. Season to taste with salt and pepper boil for several minutes.

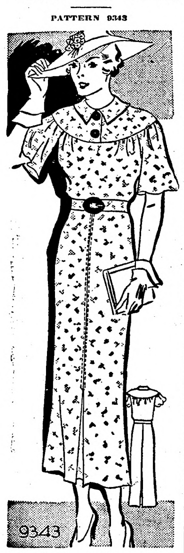
Frock That Puts Accent on Youth

PATTERN 9343



Always a good beginning, this youthful tailored collar on the simple yoke makes a demure foil for the dainty softness of the bodice. The prettiness of the chic frock is furthered with a graceful flare sleeve—or it may puff, if you prefer. The results are so satisfying you'll find it real fun to run up this little dress in a dainty printed silk or cotton. A soft handkerchief linen would be stunning, too, and so easy to tub. Buttons and belt can pick up a color in the print and make a striking accent.

Pattern 9343 may be ordered only in sizes 14, 16, 18, 20, 32, 34, 36, 38, 40 and 42. Size 16 requires 3⅛ yards 39-inch fabric. Complete, diagrammed sew chart included.

SEND FIFTEEN CENTS in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for this pattern. Be sure to write plainly your NAME, ADDRESS, the STYLE NUMBER and SIZE.

Send your order to the Sewing Circle Pattern Department, 232 West Eighteenth Street, New York, N. Y.

SYNOPSIS

Following his father's bitter criticism of his idle life, and the withdrawal of financial assistance, Hal Ireland, only son of a wealthy banker, finds himself practically without funds but with the promise of a situation in San Francisco, which he must reach, from New York, within a definite time limit. He takes passage with a cross-country auto party on a "share expense" basis. With five other members of the party, an attractive girl, Barry Trafford; middle-aged Giles Kerrigan; Sister Anastasia, a nun; and an individual whom he instinctively dislikes, Martin Crack, he starts his journey. Barry's reticence annoys him. To Kerrigan he takes at once, but he is unable to shake off a feeling of uneasiness. He distrusts Crack, although finding his intimacy with Kerrigan ripening, and he makes a little progress with Barry. Through a misunderstanding, at a stopping place, Hal is directed to Barry's room, instead of his own. Propinquity seems to soften Barry's unfriendliness, and they exchange kisses. Next day Hal tells Barry he loves her. She only answers that she mustn't love him, without giving any reason.

Kerrigan's eyes danced merrily under their half mustaches. "You're sure the torque hasn't taken charge?" he said. "Wouldn't like to stop off for a cold shower somewhere down the line?"

"Stop for nothing, suh," said Hal. "I want the Mississippi, what Ring Lardner jokingly called the Father of Waters. It is out here somewhere, isn't it?"

"Was last time I came through," said Kerrigan, the sparkle of his look laughing with and at Hal's.

Hal had a glimpse of Barry's face: her eyes, unpreoccupied, gave him brief, intimate approval, and his heart sang higher.

As each vista gave way to another level run over closely farmed country, Hal grew impatient for that coming to the rim of a long plateau which he conceived would reveal the Mississippi, flat and blue and broad, lying infinitely off toward the veils of the horizon on either hand. Then, after they had settled down to what seemed another whole country of unwatered farmland, Kerrigan took the dead cigarette end from his lips and leaned forward. "The old fella," he said quietly; and he added, as if he meant it to be all very casual, "Here, let me treat you to your first Mississippi crossing." He reached into his trousers pocket, jingling change.

They went out on the narrow track slowly, each slanted girder flicking a gentle echo at them, and neither Hal nor Kerrigan spoke. Halfway across, Mrs. Pulsipher's voice bustled suddenly into the car: "Why, this is the Mississippi river."

"It—it is," said John, as if she'd waked him out of guilty reverie.

"Is it, Mr. Kerrigan?"

"The original, mam."

Hal said to Kerrigan, "Remember Huck Finn and that nigger on the raft; the loaves of bread with mercury in 'em floating down and a cannon booming over the water from the ferry boat, to raise their bodies."

"Gad, sir, wasn't I just thinking of that?" said Kerrigan—half startled, half pleased, as if it were a joint experience which he thought Hal might have forgotten. "I never cross the old rogue without thinking of it. I swear—just that minute—I was nowhere else but there."

"Then there's more than one mind-reader along," said Hal drily, a faint check upon his full pleasure.

"Meaning?" said Kerrigan.

Hal gave a brief shake of his head, aware of Crack sitting behind him, retrospectively aware that he had been there all afternoon. Hal had the curious impulse to recall what he'd thought and said in that time, as you might try to remember what you'd done in a room where you find you've been watched. Then he caught himself and shook off the quick discomfort. Crack might sit there as knowingly, as pleased with private, drowsy thoughts as he liked: he had nothing to do with Hal or the Mississippi or this moment.

Then Kerrigan tossed up a thick finger to indicate the Burlington shore where their bridge ran over the railway. "That belongs," he said. Four white ex-Pullman cars stood on a siding, a patiently suffered curvature to their wooden spines, broad roofs smoothed down over open-end-platforms, window-arches gay with marbled glass. Along their white sides, gold letters were painted: "Davenport Bros. Great World's Fair Shows."

"Gosh," Barry called from the back, "wouldn't it be fun to see their show?"

"It would," said Kerrigan. "It'd be fun to see it, and stow away in those cars afterward."

"It'd be fun," said Hal, "to do almost anything." And in saying that, there was a separate sharing of this moment with both Barry and Kerrigan, a thankful comfort that could put away the uneasiness of a minute ago—almost put it quite away. The night was near now, and his coming to Barry, to the rout of fear from her bravery, and to his hope of Fortune in the world.

Iowa rolled in tireless undulations, the road taped over them like the flat-healed scar of a careful cut, the coming loops visible from each rise. The sun went behind a long, fagged cloud in the west, edging it with white incandescence and spreading a fan of tapered shafts below. They crossed the Skunk river, and rolled on over the dips and rises toward the sinking sun. If there had been a chance of persuading Mrs. Pulsipher to put up with the facilities of a little place called Agency, Hal and Kerrigan would have stopped there, for the taste of its name. But Ottumwa was close beyond, and they found clean tourist cabins in a grove of trees beside the Des Moines river, where the hopeful, snug squeaking of crickets in the grass made the gathered evening seem cooler.

The proprietor said that, given time, his old lady would throw together as good a feed, and better, and cheaper, than any they could get in them places uptown. Hal took Rasputin to a garage and supervised his priming for tomorrow. And when he got back, the others were halfway through a meal that had even such intrepid appetites as the Pulsiphers' working uphill. The full buoyancy that Hal had carried through the afternoon still refused to take account of hunger. He did the swift best he could, so that the proprietor's old lady shouldn't be hurt; but when Barry pushed her chair back from the long table and squeaked her lips at Doc, he abandoned the business abruptly and followed her outdoors.

Fresh eagerness exulted in his blood, tried to lift his body with a hundred different excitements, urged him to leap and shout out his joy for these hints of immortality. He stopped her walking with his hand, turned her to him and held her while he said, "Barry, we've got to go somewhere—quickly."

In the light from her cabin under the trees, he saw that her smile was slow, the droop of her eyelids slow, weary. "Hal, we can't," she said, as if he had been urging her for a long time. "I couldn't—couldn't tell you what I have to. I'm too tired to be strong. I shouldn't tell you it's hoping, wishing, praying about you that's made me so tired, but I want to tell you. Because I—I— Hal, we can't go: I've got to go in." She moved a little, as if she were going to let her head go against his shoulder. But she stopped herself, and her low, lovely voice murmured, "My darling."

"You don't have to tell me anything," said Hal, shocked by the quiet decision that was trying to rob him of this time he had so surely looked to: "all you have to do is listen to me, to the things I must tell you. You can rest, listening to them—just up there, a little way, by the river. We'll sit against a tree, and when you want me to stop, I'll stop and you can sleep on my shoulder. I promise, if you tell me to, I won't speak again—not a word, not even what keeps on running and trembling in all my nerves, muscles, heart, tongue, everything: I love you. I love you so that—"

"Hal, don't, oh, don't, please, Hal darling." Her free hand gripped his arm hard, and he couldn't tell whether it shook to enforce what she said or whether the desperation that shivered under her voice was in her body, too.

"Barry," said Hal in severe quiet. "You've got to listen. Why do you frighten yourself? Why do you try to frighten me—before you've let me say what I must say, before—"

Her exclamation was a whimper of fear, and she turned her frantic head toward the cabin. "Sister Anastasia!"

The door opened on the neat, lighted room of raw boards, with the nun's silhouette in the oblong. "Yes, sweet?" she said, her modest voice tranquil and soothing as the sound of a little wind among sleeping trees.

"Sister, I just wanted to know you were there. I'm coming now. Please wait for me." She bowed her head as if to see more clearly the joining of their hands in the dimness. "Good night, my darling," she said hurriedly. "I'm a coward—a coward, and I'm so sorry."

She had her hand away from him, and quickly she was at the nun's side in the lighted doorway.

* * * * * * *

"I'll bet you," said Kerrigan, and the smoking cigarette end in the corner of his mouth looked short enough to burn him, "I'll bet you if we went in to town we could find a something would knock us out from under our hats."

"I'll bet you we couldn't," said Hal listlessly, the echo of Rasputin's long droning in his ears again. "I'll bet you two somethings we couldn't."

"Sir, a wager," said Kerrigan. "Do we ride or walk?"

"Walk," said Hal. "It's not far."

In spite of the fact that he had no use for it, he felt the soft, impermanent refreshment under the stars. It was to him as if, out of a world murmurous with simple expectancy and unentangled pleasure in the hushed resting of the night, he were singled out for traffic with deviousness and complication. Put into plain order of words, it was all so straightforward: he loved Barry; she indicated by every look, every gesture, every shading of her low voice that she was, at the least, ready to love him. So there they were—or should be. If she wasn't sure of herself, she could tell him so; if there was a more definite barrier against her coming to him, it could be spoken, faced, and—if not demolished—then circumvented. That was so simple. Barry was candid of nature, as honorable as her golden head, her lithe body, were lovely; yet she ran from him, left him to a darkened, indefinable complexity in which he felt the restive nearness of fear and remembered the prescience of something impending, something that seemed to prowl in stealth out of the future, vanish into it again when he looked warily to see its shape.

Thank heaven for Kerrigan—good Kerrigan. Hal had started out with him for the purpose of getting a stiff, resentful drink and venting his beleaguered gloom on whatever his companion chose to talk about. But just in walking beside him, Kerrigan's air of unacquisitive well-being, of confidence in the propriety to his soul of anything that might happen, brought Hal's hopes a little away from the dominion of bafflement and left his uneasy brooding to wait.

They went on up the street. Down a half-respectable alley with a wrecking car and some stacks of old tires in it, they came to a door that had "Office" printed on the dark glass; and Kerrigan knocked briskly. A crack opened, revealing bright light on unstirred layers of tobacco smoke beyond a screen, and a dim strip of face that held one steady eye.

"Pete here?" said Kerrigan.

"No."

"Like to see where he works," said Kerrigan.

"He don't work nights."

"Frisby sent us. I've got his penny."

The strip of face vanished and the door swung wider.

It was a small, unpolished room with perhaps four tables and a short bar, a mirror behind that, and on display there a museum collection of old, labeled, but empty bottles.

They sat down at a table, and a dark, competent young man waited without speaking. Kerrigan turned to him pleasantly. "What's the bourbon sitchation?" he said. There was no particular in which you could have said the young man's expression yielded to Kerrigan's friendly ease, yet it did change; and he said, "We got some stuff here in Kentucky bottles, but you wouldn't call it bourbon."

Kerrigan looked at Hal. "Rye, then?" he said.

"Fine," said Hal.

Kerrigan looked up and said "Rye."

The young man stood there watching Kerrigan steadily; he said, "Want some bourbon?"

"Bourbon?" said Kerrigan, with just the right mixture of interest and incredulity.

"Half a minute," the young man said crisply and disappeared through a door beside the bar.

"Now there you are," said Hal sincerely. "If I lived to be a hundred, I'd never have the gift. Here it is fifteen minutes after you decide you want a drink in a strange town, and you not only get it but get something special, almost without asking for it. I need lessons."

The young man came back with a veteran bottle, three-quarters full. Kerrigan read the stained label reverently while they waited for glasses and water. It was bourbon, and not of this decade either ; and even before they tasted it they had tacitly acknowledged that this time was ripe for something more than a nightcap. Kerrigan hooked a chair toward him with his toe and swung his feet up on it before he said, on a relaxed key, "It's a good trip: and there's more of it coming to us yet."

"Hope not more of it only," said Hal.

"There's a toast no bourbon's too good for," Kerrigan said quickly, almost as if there were something a little foolish about saying it. "A good trip," he went on, "in spite of something funny, something queer going on that—". He stopped as Hal's look promptly sharpened. "Maybe you know all about it," he said.

"I don't know a thing about it," said Hal, "but every so often it gives me a scunner, makes me feel something might be going to happen."

"Y'know," Kerrigan began, watching the young bartender pass to answer a knock at the door, "we had gifts once, a couple of ten-thousand years ago, when we were roaring around Middle Europe in bearskins, looking out for ourselves and making darn few mistakes—we had gifts then that have got good and rusty since. Sometimes we get some use out of 'em—in hunches, intuitions; sometimes one of those rusty gadgets will get contact—try to do its job—and our civilized, so-called minds can't make out what that bumping is in the cellar; it makes us uncomfortable. If you could harness that, even without understanding it—"

The bartender came to their table and leaned his hands on it, looking down at its ring-stained surface. "There's somebody wants in," he said. "Says he knows you two." He looked at Kerrigan.

Kerrigan glanced at Hal in dubious expectance, then up at the young man again. "Don't know anybody here," he said, giving his head a shake that was not quite final. "No. Tell him he's made a mistake; or—wait, I'll look at him." He dropped his feet and heaved himself up reluctantly.

Just talking about it had brought that unsubstantial whisper of premonition somewhere near again; Hal cursed it, and the interruption that left him there alone with it.

Behind the screen the doorlatch clicked and there was a moment of silence. Then without surprise or pleasure, Kerrigan's voice said, "Why, hello there, splash"; and he came back into the room looking gloomily thoughtful. Martin Crack ambled after him, his smooth-skinned face under tidy hair barely stirred by the slight unassuming smile.

"Sit down, sit down," Kerrigan grumbled at him.

The letter was in reply to a telegram from Senator Weber asking Mr. Peterson to change his opinion relative to the payments so as to eliminate the requirement of equal quality.

Check on Spending

Washington.—When President Roosevelt entered the White House March 4, 1933, every dollar of federal money that was expended was accounted for and the vouchers reviewed by the general accounting offices. J. Raymond McCarl, comptroller general of the United States, occupied and still occupies an independent position in the accountings he directed and the reviews that were made under the budget and accounting law. But with the arrival of the New Deal and the crisis in government and the nation arising from the depression, scores of new laws were enacted, new agencies of government were created and billions of dollars were appropriated, the bulk of it being spent without reference to the accounting act or the bureau of the budget. Congress, under White House direction, did not make these new agencies or their spending accountable to the comptroller general.

It was almost two years before President Roosevelt saw fit to make any of the emergency agencies, the alphabetical soup, amenable to the general accounting office. Consequently, millions upon millions of dollars were spent and only the spending agencies knew whether they were spent in accordance with law. Now, however, things have changed. Late last winter, the President began extending the broad wings of the general accounting office over emergency agencies and has continued to do so until, only the other day, the last of these were made responsible to the comptroller general. Thus an independent governmental unit—one with no axes to grind—again is in a position to say whether federal money is being spent as congress directed and in a manner which the taxpayers have the right to demand.

This spending of money in gigantic amounts always breeds suspicion. It causes people to inquire, whatever the form of government may be or whatever political party may be in control, whether there is waste or graft, whether the then office holders are feathering their own nests, and many another question of the like. It was true in the case of the New Deal. Observers here in Washington constantly were receiving information alleging that this individual or that had been displaying signs of unusual prosperity; that rumors were afloat concerning graft and crookedness in one agency or another and that "somebody ought to expose" the goings-on with respect to a named department of government. It was not an unusual circumstance because in every administration we here in Washington who attempt to see and to hear as much as we can, get the same kind of reaction. Only, it seemed to have been worse this time and well it may have been because the amount of money made available to President Roosevelt and his subordinates was so much larger. It is my belief, however, that there has not been more of this intangible thing called graft in government in the present administration than in most others. There has been some crookedness because there have been court convictions of some officials but I expect when and if the future lays bare all facts concerning the present administration and its handling of the vast sums of money available to it, it will be disclosed that most of the New Deal officials have been honest in their disbursement of funds. Their friends may have profited but, if they have, that is just a repetition of an old story, a circumstance always developing in a government managed under the two party system. To the victors always go the spoils.

* * *

Criticize Spending

If Mr. Roosevelt has been able to keep down straight-out crookedness, he is to be commended. It will remove from the forthcoming campaign some of the mud slinging that really has no place in national politics. But, while the President is entitled to commendation for the attempts at honest disbursement of funds, I hear more and more criticism of the way the money has been spent. Indeed, it appears now that the vast expenditures by the administration are likely to be as much of a campaign issue as is his proposal to alter the Constitution to fit New Deal plans.

Every one knows that when an individual's pocketbook is touched, he rises in revolt. By the time the next election comes around individuals will have had their pocketbooks touched rather forcibly by national and state and local taxes of an increased amount. Thus, it is easy to see how the criticism of Roosevelt's spending is growing and can continue to grow. The government has been pushed ten or ten or twelve billion more in debt and the end is not in sight, despite the fact that Mr. Roosevelt has intimated on several occasions lately that he proposes to curtail federal expenditures except for emergency purposes. Those announcements and any future declarations he may make are not going to soften the antagonistic feeling that people have for any public official who wastes money whether the motives be proper or improper.

From this point, one may look into the crystal of the 1936 campaign and it takes no stretch of the imagination to visualize what a pounding the New Deal opposition will give the Roosevelt administration on this question of spending.

When Mr. Roosevelt began spending, he declared it was justified because hundreds of thousands of citizens were starving. His next pronouncement on this subject by way of explaining continued expenditure was that if the government spent freely, it would serve as a priming of the economic pump; that the circulation of federal money would allow industry to sell and that industry would replace by manufacture the things sold. That, too, brought little or no result. Then we entered the current stage where the spending was to be closely supervised and only projects that held promise of actually developing manufacture and retail selling would be approved and financed by federal money. It is regrettable but it is a fact that almost nothing has come of this program.

And to make matters worse, lately, Secretary Ickes, public works administrator, and Relief Administrator Harry Hopkins have locked horns on the bulk of the projects on which federal money was to be used.

It is not strange that these two men should differ. Mr. Hopkins, being a trained, a professional, welfare worker, sees things only from the standpoint of the individual who needs food. Mr. Ickes has a conception of federal spending that embraces the use of money in ways designed to start the great industries in motion. He figures that if these industries get going, they will employ workers; the workers will spend their wages and the retailers will profit thereby and, as the retailers sell from their shelves, they seek replacements from the manufacturers. The controversy between Mr. Hopkins and Mr. Ickes, therefore, is not one to be settled by compromise or by soft words. In fact, it may never be settled until one or the other gets out of his place in the government.

* * *

Break for Taxpayers

The importance of the Ickes-Hopkins row to the reader of this column, however, lies largely in the fact that the particular reader is a taxpayer. The connection is simply this: the last congress appropriated $4,880,000,000 for use by the administration in public works and relief. If all of that sum were spent the public debt would be increased by that amount because internal revenue taxes are insufficient to offset more than the ordinary government expenditures. Therefore, if all of this money is not spent, and it cannot be spent if the Ickes-Hopkins dispute continues to hold back administration plans, then the taxpayers will have just that much less of a government debt to meet through this payment of their taxes.

So the President's order placing all administrative agencies under the general accounting office to see that their spending is honestly done and the developments within the administration over a difference in policy must be taken together as a break for the taxpayer.

* * *

Potato Control

Agriculture adjustment administration officials are about ready to present to the farmers of this country a detailed plan for control of potato production. It will provide means for boosting the incomes of the potato farmers something more than 100 per cent, and will increase the cost of this item of food to consumers by a proportionate amount, of course. Conferences soon will be held between the AAA and representatives of farmers' organizations to work out phases of the plan reqpiring farmer approval.

Various thoughts arise if one reflects upon potato control. First, control of potato production marks the fourteenth agricultural crop brought under regimentation and it presents, probably, the toughest of all of them in the matter of enforcing its provisions.

Adoption of the potato control program represents attainment of a point in the life of the AAA where one step has led to another until control of potatoes was essential, or the whole plan of crop control flops. It will be recalled that the declared purpose of the AAA at the beginning was only for the control of cotton. Land withheld from cotton then was planted to tobacco and tobacco had to be controlled; when tobacco was controlled, and the land withdrawn, farmers in some sections turned to peanuts and peanuts had to be controlled.

I understand the AAA is considerably worried about the job of enforcing the potato control law. That law provides compulsion against overproduction in the form of a tax club—a tax of 45 cents a bushel. In addition, there are penalties of an amazingly severe kind—$1,000 fine for the first offense and imprisonment for not more than a year for the second.

NOT YET READY FOR PRESIDENCY

Mrs. Roosevelt Says U. S. Does Not Want Woman for Chief Executive.

Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt answers the question, "Can a Woman Ever Be President of the United States?" in the Cosmopolitan.

"Certainly, a woman can be President," she states, "in all probability some time a woman will be, but she may not, in my opinion, be elected at the present time or in the near future. People in general do not like the idea of a woman as Chief Executive.

"Men and women in this country today would vote for a man against a woman for President no matter what her qualifications might be. I, for one, am glad this is so, for when a woman assumes this great responsibility, other women throughout the country should be qualified to help her carry the burden of that office. This will require a far more general development of interest in public questions, past and present, and more willingness to serve in public positions than we have yet seen."

Before they are Presidential timber, the First Lady believes women must not only possess the character, education and physical strength which the office demands of men, but they must mature politically. They must become leaders. They must conquer their emotionalism, and their too personal point of view. They must assume responsibility and take the consequences.

"Before a woman may serve the country usefully as President, not to speak of being elected," she goes on, "we women as a whole shall have to be more willing to master subjects which we have considered uninteresting; we shall have to be willing to perform tasks which we have shunned in the past; we shall, I believe, have to reach the point in industry and government where the sex line is practically removed.

"The vast majority of women have not yet attained the power to be objective about their work and impersonal in their business contacts. They must learn to stand criticism and disagreement without allowing personal feeling to enter into their evaluations of that criticism. They must freely grant the other person's right to a different point of view. . . . They must stand on their own feet and make no excuses. They should come up from the bottom and learn their jobs in public life step by step. Above all, they must learn to take other women with them. They must learn that only in proportion as women as a whole are educated in public affairs will individual women succeed in positions of importance.

"When women are prepared and do assume leadership and command a following, regardless of sex, I believe that the advance of the human race toward the goal of human happiness will be more rapid than it has ever been."

HITCH-HIKING FLY SPREADS DISEASE

The common house fly is a hitch-hiker. However, the fly doesn't bother to jerk a thumb and ask a ride; it flies into moving autos or even trains or airplanes without permission and often travels hundreds of miles before leaving its chosen vehicle.

This habit of flies traveling great distances on other power than their own has made local fly eradication campaigns less effective than the campaigners hoped. Cases have been found where a fly carried disease germs on its legs and body for miles and infected people in the community where it settled. No previous cases of the disease were in existence in the new community and health authorities could find no other source of infection than flies.

Repeated warnings of physicians and health officials have apparently failed to instill a proper fear of the house fly in the average mind. However, a more thorough knowledge of the habits of a fly would increase the respect for this tiny insect, according to authorities on the subject.

Decent cleanliness in any home requires protection against the menace of flies. Whether a fly is home-born or a hitch-hiking visitor, he is a danger. Fortunately, an effective fly-killing program can be conducted in any home by the use of a reliable fly spray containing an ample quantity of Pyrethrins, a product derived from Pyrethrum flowers, which is death to flies, when sprayed in a fine mist.

"I've discovered Calumet's big, new 10¢ can!"

"No more 'by-guess-and-by-golly' baking in this house now!" says Mrs. Owen H. Fleming, 1235 Judson Ave., Evanston, Ill.

Mrs. Fleming was one of the first women to get the big, new 10c can of Calumet, the Double-Acting Baking Powder.

"No need for any woman to take chances with her baking now," she says. "That new 10c can of Calumet certainly means that the very best can be bought at a bargain."

Ask your grocer to show you the new, bigger 10c Calumet can!

• • •

A SIMPLE TWIST . . . and the Easy-Off Top lifts off. No spilling, no broken finger-nails!

WHY DOES CALUMET give such astonishing "baking luck?" Why is Calumet different from other baking powders? Because Calumet combines two distinct leavening actions. A quick one for the mixing bowl. A slower one for the oven . . . And Calumet's famous double-action is so perfectly balanced and controlled that it produces perfect leavening—every time.

All Calumet prices are lower! Calumet is now selling at the lowest prices in its history. The Full-Pound Can now sells regularly for only 25¢. And if you want a smaller size—get the new, big 10¢ can—a lot of good baking for a dime—with Calumet, the Double-Acting Baking Powder.

Safetygrams

People have the mistaken idea that if they can start and stop a car and guide it, they are good drivers. What a mistake that is.

A safe driver must be able to control his car, He must be alert to driving problems and above all things must anticipate possible mistakes of other drivers and pedestrians.

This requires mental alertness at all times. You cannot go to sleep driving an automobile. If you get tired and sleepy on the road, I'd suggest that you pull up to the curb as far as possible and stop your automobile. Get out of the car and walk about a quarter of a mile and back to your car as fast as your legs will permit. This will get your blood in motion and will relieve you of fatigue temporarly. If you get tired again after another hour or so repeat this performance, and you will find that you will not only be a mentally aleut driver, but a very wide awake and safe driver.

This has been tried and proven successful. While walking, however, be sure that you walk on the leftside of the road facing the traffic so that you will not be bumped off by another sleepy driver.

Holt vs Mud Lake Project

There seems to be a lot of opposition to the Project being put thru in the Mud Lake Area by the Conservation Commission at this time.

As the business people of Holt do not know the feeling of all the farmers in the Mud Lake Community in regards to this, we have set Wednesday evening, October 16th, 1935 as a time when we want all interested in this project to come to Holt for a mass meeting and discuss the matter. There are at this time others who are not so hot about seeing this deal go any further and it may be well for all to have an understanding now as to how much in favor of the project the people are who live out out there.

Come to the Community Hall at Holt on Wednesday evening October 16, at 8 p. m.

Famed 'Last Man' Dies

The Last Man's club or Company B, First Minnesota volunteer infantry, was dissolved by death Friday night.

Captain Charles M. Lockwood of Chamberlain, South Dakota, 93-year-old Civil war veteran and last surviving member of the famous organization, died at the Minnesota soldiers home hospital, where he had spent his last three winters.

One of the first to answer President Lincoln's call for 75,000 volunteers in 1860, Lockwood with 34 other veterans of the Civil war formed the club in Stillwater, Minn., July 21, 1885, anniversary of the battle of Bull Run.

At the first reunion a bottle of wine was set aside to be opened by the last surviving member. He was to drink a toast to his dead comrades and formally dissolve the "Last, Man,s Club."

Five years ago, July 21, 1930, Captain Lookwood carried out that ceremony, at the old Sawyer house in Stillwater, scene of the first meeting. Thirty four chairs, all but one draped in black, were placed around the reunion table.

Lockwood arose, took one sip of the wine—turned to vinegar by time—and recited a toast to his departed comrades.

Born at Prairie Du Chien, Wisconsin, August 16, 1842, Lockwood marched away to join the colors when he was 18. He served throughout the war, receiving a captain,s commission in 1863.

Tigers Won World Series

Leon Allen Goslin, an anmiable New Jersey farmer known far and wide as "The Goose" struck the blow Monday that carried the Detroit Tigers to their first world championship in a slugging riproaring finish to the baseball wars of 1935.

With the score tied, two out and Manager Mickey Cochrane on second base in the last half of the ninth inning, the Goose produced the golden basehit, a line single over the head of Billy Herman, star second baseman of the Chicago Cubs, that brought Cochrane home with the deciding run.

Goslin's winning hit off Larry French, Cub southpaw, gave the battling Bengals a 4-3 victory in the sixth game and carried them to triumph in the series by a margin of four games to two and enabled Tommy Bridges, curveball righthander, to achieve his second pitching conquest after a thrilling struggle.

Coming after a brilliant stand by Bridges, who stopped the Cubs cold in their half of the 9th after Stan Hack had opened with a tripple to deepest center, the Goose'e wallop touched off one of the wildest home-town demonstrations any world series has witnessed since Walter Johnson pitched the Washington Senators to victory over the New York Giants at the nation's capitol in 1924.

Pay Up $1800 Bond

At the regular meeting of the School Board of Independent District No. 35 Holt School, the board went on record as recommending to the County PWA Committee that the piece of road between Sec. 20 and 29, Holt Township be included in the Works Proposals inasmuch as this certain road is used as a school bus route and U. S. Mail Route and that it is in need of repairs at this time.

The school board also set their tax levy for the coming year and took up the matter of retiring $1800 worth of State Bonds. Much discussion was held on the subject of the changing of a certain bus route but the matter was tabled after it was agreed upon that the route could not be changed on account of road conditions.

SYNOPSIS

Following his father's criticism of his idle life, and the withdrawal of financial assistance, Hal Ireland, son of a wealthy banker, finds himself practically without funds but with the promise of a situation in San Francisco, which he must reach, from New York, within a definite time limit. He takes passage with a cross-country auto party on a "share expense" basis. With five other members of the party, an attractive girl, Barry Trafford; middle-aged Giles Kerrigan; Sister Anastasia, a nun; and an individual whom he instinctively dislikes, Martin Crack, he starts his journey. Barry's reticence annoys him. To Kerrigan he takes at once, but he distrusts Crack. He finds his intimacy with Kerrigan ripening, and makes a little progress with Barry. Through a misunderstanding, at a stopping place, Hal is directed to Barry's room, instead of his own. Barry drops her unfriendliness and they exchange kisses. Next day he tells her he loves her. She answers that she mustn't love him, without giving any reason.

Crack's light-blue eyes sought Hal's—hopeful, it might have seemed, of some sign of pleasure, though not counting on it. Hal wondered again why, under their lazy hopefulness, the eyes should seem to know something that gave them faintly mischievous amusement, seemed also to weigh the possibility of Hal's knowing what it was. "Hi there," said Hal, nodding: there was always something stopped his being quite civil to this quiet, narrow little fella.

"Happened to see you come down here," Crack said, addressing himself to Hal without hurry, "and thought y'wouldn't care if I came." He paused, as if on the chance Hal would say it was all right. Then he turned to Kerrigan, less amiably. "After you're through this round, I'll buy one."

"Nice of you," said Kerrigan, "but we got this bottle between us. Welcome to help yourself."

"Oh," said Crack. "Well, thanks. Maybe just a little one."

And here it was spoiled between Hal and Kerrigan; Hal's rising heart turned dully toward bottom again, toward the fretful confusions that hedged and tripped and badgered his longing for Barry and the wonder of her straight, golden loveliness. He could have escaped through Kerrigan for the time: but now there was only the bourbon, and he knew beforehand it wouldn't be any good to him.

They went back, with a pretense of relish, to items in the day's journey. Crack sat unobtrusively enough, sipping his drink as if it were some not unpalatable medicine, half attentive to what was said, half concerned with his own drowsy speculations. Under his gentle fingers the golf ball moved round a ring of wet on the table. He looked from one to other of them as they talked, except when Hal said something especially enthusiastic; then Crack would watch him through part of Kerrigan's next speech, as if wondering what had made Hal say that, or as if too indolent to turn his head away when he would be turning it back again in a moment. Then in a pause, without stirring himself, he said to Hal, "I bet you know Broadway pretty well—livin' in N'York."

"There's a couple of other things to do in New York you know," said Hal, looking at him briefly.

The inviting smile stayed on Crack's fair-skinned face and in his youthfully knowing eyes; the golf-ball was motionless under his finger.

"But if you want good-lookin' babes and a good time, Broadway's a pretty good place to get 'em," he said.

"I've heard it was," said Hal, and felt a hypocrite.

Kerrigan drew breath to speak, but Crack—watching Hal—ignored him, saying, "Did you ever go to a place called the Wrong Door?"

"No," said Hal dully; and made himself add, "What's that?"

"Well, it's sort of a—"

"A joint, on West Fifty-third street," Kerrigan interrupted, with a short nod. "You a friend of Jed Silver's?"

Crack's smile was modest, his eyes uncertain, as if he'd been paid a compliment he didn't deserve. He barely glanced at Kerrigan, at his golf-ball, then shyly at Hal as he said: "Well, I sorta know Jed. He's sorta nice to me sometimes, when I'm in N'York."

"See him this last trip?" Kerrigan asked in perfunctory interest.

That pleased Crack sufficiently so that he turned his indolent smile to Kerrigan. "Yeah," he said. "Was up there—talkin' with him an' all coupla nights before we started." He turned back to Hal. "He's got a—"

Without triumph Kerrigan interrupted him again: "Guess you didn't know they raided his place in June, stripped the fixtures out, and put Silver on ice to wait for his rap—and not only for dry-law violation either."

Crack flushed, and a sharp restiveness stood caged in the drowsy blue of his eyes. "No," he said quickly, down at his golf-ball, "I didn't know it."

"Must have been a grand guy to get himself jailed in New York," Hal said to Kerrigan.

"Just a big crime-baby," said Kerrigan in quiet pre-occupation.

Crack's quiet persistence—insinuated even when he was silent—recognized no finality at the table. In a moment, "Say," he said to Hal, "it'd be fun to lay over more'n one night in some of these towns—to get acquainted. Comin' up the road tonight, it looked like there was talent here."

"Guess you could find any amount of it here or anywhere else," said Hal tastelessly, "if you felt like it."

Crack's immature, faintly smiling lips were undecided between embarrassment and assurance. He had the air of making remarks not so much for the direct reply as for the indirect reaction. "You—" he said insecurely, hopefully, "it don't seem like you felt like it very much."

Hal gave him an honest, impersonal look and said flatly, "I don't." Even as he turned to Kerrigan, he knew Crack's speculation was still lazily upon him. But then Kerrigan's expression was different: he was watching Crack with a severe vigilance that seemed outright inimical. Hal looked back quickly, to see what it was; the uncertain smile hadn't altered much: there was only reticent mischief in it again for his saying, "I guess maybe you got other things on your mind."

Hal barely heard the remark. "Nothing on my mind," he said, "except to make five hundred miles tomorrow." He glanced at his watch. "Late, Colonel," he added to Kerrigan. Kerrigan was still watching Crack as if he'd seen him tuck an ace up his sleeve.

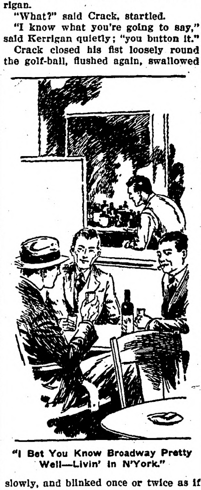
"You don't think maybe—" Crack began with diffident care: "you don't think maybe you'd feel different if they wasn't somebody that's—"

"Button it up, slipstream," said Kerrigan.

"What?" said Crack, startled.

"I know what you're going to say," said Kerrigan quietly; "you button it."

Crack closed his fist loosely round the golf-ball, flushed again, swallowed slowly, and blinked once or twice as if his eyes stung. "I wasn't talking to you," he said, his voice cracking once, warmed out of shiftlessness. "You might's well keep out of my business."



"I Bet You Know Broadway Pretty Well—Livin' in N'York."

"If it was your business," said Kerrigan, his voice firm and too quiet, "I'd keep out of it surely . . . Plug your exhaust, splash, hear?"

Moisture appeared round the new intensity of Crack's eyes, and blushing besieged the roots of his straight, mouse-colored hair. The unmobile face seemed to want to grimace but not to know how.

"Keep out of," he suddenly recited on a warning rise of tone. "Keep out of my business, you dang ——— old drunk."

Hal, starting to his feet, had one astonished glimpse of Kerrigan's face—older, less ruddy, gravely compliant, essentially inattentive to Crack's venom. Hal's chair bouncing over backward made Crack whip round and rise all in one startled motion, as if he had forgotten Hal was there. He was stumbling away sidewise before he'd well caught his balance, his golf-ball on the jump over the floor, as Hal went for him. Then the feel of his throat was between Hal's thumbs, fingers overlapped at the back, and it was the best thing he ever remembered having in his hands. His teeth tried to push one another back into their aching roots for that moment of fine squeezing. Somebody careened hard against him from the side and an arm, like the loop of a jerked hawser at his midriff, swung him away, ripping off his hold. The dark, certain young man from behind the bar stood close beside him, watching him pant through his open mouth as if he'd had fifteen minutes' hard wrestling.

"Listen, friend," said the young bartender, quiet, unsolicitous, unresentful; "kill him outside, will you?"

Hal, looking at him, grew steady at once, without surrendering a single good fragment of his hate. The young man's hand was spread on Hal's moving chest.

"Colonel," said Hal in smoldering steadiness, "if it'll do your experience-museum any good to watch me, I'll be glad to kill him."

"Brother, listen," the young man went on surely, "we got a little business here, see? And it won't help it none to have bodies on the premises. I want you to kill him all right, if you wanta; but some place else, friend, hey? Some place else."

"All right," said Hal. "Let me talk to him."

The bartender's hand came down, and Hal walked toward Crack.

"You'll apologize," he said.

He heard Kerrigan breathing beside him; he was sorry to make him stand listening to this.

Crack's close-set eyes were frightened not by what Hal might do to him but by the realization of what he himself had done. He nodded his head quickly several times, saying: "I—I'll apologize. I'll apologize."

"You'll kneel on the floor to do it," said Hal. Crack glanced at the floor as if to see whether there was something especially vile he had to kneel in, but his eyes came quickly back to Hal's, for fear of missing something.

Hal waited. Crack knelt awkwardly, watching Hal for some sign of an extra way to please him. Then he turned his reluctant look to Kerrigan.

"I'm sorry," he said. "I take it back. I shouldn't have said it. I'll always be sorry I said it. I shouldn't take liquor. It was that. It makes me crazy. I do things I'm sorry for. I— I hope you'll forget it. It was an awful thing to say—terrible." He seemed to be inwardly frightened just thinking about it.

Hal heard Kerrigan say, "Get up."

Then he looked at him, smiling an attempt at unremorseful apology, and said, "Finish our drinks, shall we?" He hoped they could get out of this place, having drunk and paid and said good night leisurely—all before the complete, trembling backwash of fury took him, before Kerrigan or the competent young chap at the bar should see how badly he would tremble.

CHAPTER VI

Saturday

It was a grander breadth into which the Iowa morning lighted them. Hal had pictured how it would be in the car this day: restraint, uneasiness, with periodic attempt to force aside a loaded atmosphere. But, as Rasputin's honest, sturdy speed rushed them westward, it was not at all as Hal had pictured it. A sentence of his father's that muddy morning in New York, drew his rueful smile: "Another thing you need to get over is this cheerful idea that any little world you're in revolves around you." And it was a new sort of pleasure to Hal to close away his prepared moodiness and join himself with the closer companionship in which the morning started.

"Well, here we are again," said Mrs. Pulsipher in a tone of comfortable settling to pleasure. "It seems like we fit together into one big family, don't it?"

John Pulsipher broke off his monotonous humming of the tune that might once, long ago, have been "The Arkansas Traveler." "Say," he said cautiously, leaning a little between Hal and Kerrigan, "where did you fellers go to last night?"

"Down the street—to one of Joe's places," said Kerrigan, as if the memory of it were genial pleasure to him.

"Next time," John submitted, excitement under his caution, "if there's nothin' private you two got to talk over, would you maybe let me—let me—"

"Bet your lodge-emblem," said Kerrigan in quick benevolence; and the implication that he spoke for them both in such a gesture underscored Hal's good sense of their nearer intimacy, tacitly established last night, tacitly acknowledged and savored this morning. That was something Crack had done for him.

There had been no mark on Crack's throat this morning, over the small opening of the lapels; and Hal would forget that he had last night paid the narrow, insinuating little soul the compliment of wanting to strangle it out of the narrow, old-fashioned little body. Crack's apology last night had worn a certain horrified, bewildered sincerity; and if Kerrigan forgave the little mongrel, Hal needn't dignify him by hate.

It didn't matter. All that really mattered was Barry—her blue eyes washed clean of last night's fear, freshly lighted by the loveliness that gave its life to her lovely body. She was there in the car, secure and warm and whole for him to come to. Whatever it was that had held her back, made her throw in his way such an irrelevant obstacle as last night's calling of Sister Anastasia, it couldn't—even if it were to return—stand against a necessity as enveloping, as foreordained as the coming of summer to a wintry year. There was ripened power, even, in Hal's discovery that he was no longer curious about the source of her restraints, her fears, her withdrawals. And for another time he had learned not to let himself be baffled by the shadowy children of his perverse fancy.

Even the straight road was quickened under Rasputin's steady wheels, and towns that the map forecast along the red stripe of the route succeeded each other in their brick actuality before they were expected. Between the towns the straight road shimmered in the heat ahead, as if under pale water; the farmsteads of small white house and big red barns accepted the blazing sun in stoic memory of winters past and present.

Volume production of factory-built homes will speed the return of the building industry to prosperity, Conrad Hamm, builder, believes.

Austin—A practical test of one of the New Deal's most ambitious projects—suburban homestead housing—got under way in this community when 44 families moved into dwellings erected by the federal government and for which their occupants will pay $15 a month for 30 years. Modern little structures, well built, well equipped, comfortably arranged and provided with plenty of garden space, are the homes to which Uncle Sam's tenants are moving. They represent part of the experiment in housing which the national administration has studied and nurtured many months.

Minneapolis—Plans for co-operating with the federal government in a religious education program in CCC camps throughout the nation were made by directors of the Luther league, international young people's organization of the Norwegian Lutheran Church of America, at a meeting here. Under the plan the Luther league would provide library books and volunteer instructors, who would work with chaplains in the camps in an effort to create an improved moral atmosphere.

RADIO ALARM FOR HOMES

A new invention is a radio alarm system for houses, that, when turned on at night creates a sensitive electrical zone around the exterior of the dwelling, several feet deep. When an intruder steps into this "field," a circuit breaks, the alarm sounds, and floodlights brightly illuminate the walls and yards. Users fearing that their power lines might be cut can connect the device to a storage battery.

Billings Child Knew Just Where That Clam Went

The Billings child on her Sunday visit to the beach picked up a clamshell and regarded it meditatively.

"Now I wonder where that clam has gone to?" she inquired.

Neither parent responded. Four-year-olds are always wondering something, and Billings was busy resting in the hot sand, while Mrs. Billings was busy rubbing sunburn oil on her person.

"I wonder where that clam has gone to?" repeated the Billings child. No answer being forthcoming she demanded loudly:

"Mommie, do you want to know where that clam has gone to? Daddy, do you want to know where that clam has gone to?"

Both parents averred absently that they did.

The Billings child tossed aside the empty shell, picked up her pail and shovel and started for the water. In departing she remarked:

"It's crawled into an oyster shell and is going around fooling people."—New York Sun.

Don't Entrust Your Own or Your Family's Well-Being to Unknown Preparations

BEFORE you take any preparation you don't know all about, for the relief of headaches; or the pains of rheumatism, neuritis or neuralgia, ask your doctor what he thinks about it—in comparison with Genuine Bayer Aspirin.

We say this because, before the discovery of Bayer Aspirin, most so-called "pain" remedies were advised against by physicians as being bad for the stomach; or, often, for the heart. And the discovery of Bayer Aspirin largely changed medical practice.

Countless thousands of people who have taken Bayer Aspirin year in and out without ill effect, have proved that the medical findings about its safety were correct.

Remember this: Genuine Bayer Aspirin is rated among the fastest methods yet discovered for the relief of headaches and all common pains . . . and safe for the average person to take regularly.

You can get real Bayer Aspirin at any drug store — simply by never asking for it by the name "aspirin" alone, but always saying BAYER ASPIRIN when you buy.

Washington Digest

National Topics Interpreted by William Bruckart

National Press Building Washington, D. C.

Washington.—I believe the trend of recent developments begins to indicate rather definitely that President Roosevelt is going to be able to hold a rather united Democratic party behind him in his next campaign. The chances of a split in his ranks are very small, indeed, and barring changes of which there are at present no hints at all, the New Deal will encompass the Democratic party which nominated and elected Mr. Roosevelt as President.

Party Backs Roosevelt

By those statements, it is not meant that no defections will take place. There always are some disgruntled and dissatisfied party men who break away. They have done it with Republicans and Democrats with equal abandon. There will be some in the 1936 campaign, but not very many. These statements are made by way of discounting offshoots of consequence under radical leadership and offshoots of equal consequence behind old-line conservative Democratic leadership. It is, of course, just possible that William Randolph Hearst, the publisher, and Bainbridge Colby, secretary of state under Woodrow Wilson, may succeed in development of a conservative alignment with major support but the situation is not one likely to cause the New Deal leaders any particular embarrassment. Likewise the death of Senator Huey P. Long removes what might possibly have been a radical party wedge. The late Louisiana senator was making some progress in development of a radical party but with him removed from the scene there is no longer any possibility of that group attaining a place of importance in the political structure. They are fighting among themselves and it is apparent now that the group will be split into a score of factions, none which will have any capacity to accomplish the purposes which Senator Long had outlined.

* * *

Judged impartially, the death of Senator Long ought to enhance the Democratic prospects in 1936. This certainly is true unless the administration between now and the next election decides to court the conservative vote in the country and in doing so offends the progressive segment of voters to which Mr. Roosevelt largely owes his 1932 election. To reiterate, it is possible, of course, that Mr. Roosevelt or his party advisers may make mistakes which will throw the whole party machine out of gear, but they are not now in evidence.

Long's Death Helps

The reason the passing of Huey Long is important from the political standpoint is pictured most reliably in the history of third party movements. While it is obvious that Senator Long could never have been elected President—and I believe he was too smart a politician to think that he could have been successful—there was the danger from the Roosevelt standpoint that he could alienate some part of the vote which elected Mr. Roosevelt in 1932. If he had been able to do this, it is certain that Republican chances would have been enhanced because the Republican vote would have remained solidly behind the Republican candidate.

Some years ago, Robert M. La Follette, then a senator from Wisconsin, ran for the Presidency on a third party ticket. He polled about five million votes. This happened at a time when the country was reasonably prosperous. Surely, the economic conditions were of a character that bred less discontent than those of this depression era. So, astute political observers tell me that it takes little stretch of the imagination to conceive of a radical party, led by a man of the dynamic characteristics of Huey Long, being able to poll as many as ten million votes throughout the country despite the difficulties that always face the organization of a new political party.

Whatever criticism may have been or may be voiced of the late senator from Louisiana, everywhere one goes among political leaders, he obtains the same expression of opinion respecting the senator's ability. He had a smart mind, one that grasped situations, particularly in politics, with great speed and he was always ready at a moment's notice to capitalize on those situations. Thus, if Mr. Long had lived, it is easy to imagine what he would have done in case the New Deal leaders made mistakes. He would have hopped on those mistakes with the avidity of a cat on a mouse; he would have magnified them in his speeches to his following and by these acts he would have aided and abetted the Republican opposition.

So, while the national capital was startled by Senator Long's death and appalled at the manner of his going, it is not a violation of any confidence to say that New Deal politicians are resting easier. They enjoyed Huey, the man, but they recognized in him an adversary decidedly dangerous to their cause.

* * *

Now, as to other factors involved, factors that might withdraw support from Mr. Roosevelt. I said above that the Hearst-Colby movement is doomed to defeat. The real effect and probably the only effect that movement will have will be to force the Roosevelt leaders to realign their strength in some states. Mr. Hearst, with the great power of his string of newspapers behind him, has yet to succeed in creating a potent political group. He attempted it when the late Warren Harding of Ohio was the Republican nominee and James M. Cox of the same state was put forward by the Democrats. It was my good fortune to be assigned as a correspondent to the convention of Mr. Hearst's new party. It was evident then as it later was proved by the votes that the enthusiastic delegates to that convention represented a following so small as to be utterly negligible. Even with the astute advice of Bainbridge Colby, little more will come out of the current movement.

Other Factors

Then, those who have their eyes on the facts instead of on the ballyhoo will promptly discount the talk about Democratic defection when they stop to consider some other things that are taking place. For example, there have been no more bitter dissents from New Deal policies than Senator Carter Glass of Virginia and Senator Thomas P. Gore of Oklahoma have voiced. Mr. Glass lately has engaged in rites of burying the hatchet to the extent that he is not going to run for re-election in Virginia as anything but a Democrat.

Out in Oklahoma, Senator Gore has been making speeches that sound strangely as though he is almost friendly with the administration. He has been telling his audiences that he has stood with the President on many votes in the senate, sometimes when his vote was badly needed. Though it becomes apparent that while neither Senator Glass nor Senator Gore is enthusiastic about New Deal policies, neither of them is going to desert the Democratic party.

And, so it is in any number of other cases. They may not speak glowingly of President Roosevelt in their own campaigns for re-election but as candidates they are not going to fight him openly.

* * *

"Big Jim" Farley, the master New Deal politician, successfuly avoided an out and out test of New Deal issues in Ohio when Governor Davey of that state announced recently that there would be no special election to choose a representative at large to fill a vacancy. The Ohio governor said it would cost too much money to hold a special election, his announcement being made at the White House just after President Roosevelt had agreed to allot $20,000,000 in public works funds for Ohio use.

Avoids New Deal Test

But the astute Mr. Farley is not going to be able to avoid a test on New Deal issues in Kentucky. The situation in that state is that a Democrat of President Roosevelt's choice and who is supporting the New Deal from start to finish is running for governor against a hard-boiled and conservative Republican. The election will be the first week in November and thus a state-wide vote can be expected to measure the Roosevelt strength. Because of this, all of the maneuvers are being closely watched and the battle of those ballots obviously will be bitter.

The Kentucky test takes on additional significance and importance because of something that happened in choosing the Democratic nominee. The Kentucky fight is to determine whether Lieut. Gov. A. B. Chandler, the Democrat, or former Representative King Swope, the Republican, will run the state.

Governor Laffoon apparently wanted to have the Democratic nominee selected by the old convention method but the Roosevelt supporters preferred a primary. Consequently, Senator Barkley of Kentucky, a devout Roosevelt follower in the senate, was sent into his home state to see that the primary plan was made operative. The Democratic state committee which was empowered to choose the method of selecting the candidate was determined to have a convention and it was after this determination became known that Mr. Roosevelt participated in dictating the course the party should follow. Senator Barkley arrived in his home state bearing a letter signed "Franklin D. Roosevelt" urging the primary, and while Governor Laffoon was out of the state attempting to convince national leaders that his candidate for the Democratic nomination was the right one, Lieutenant Governor Chandler called a special session of the state legislature and put through a law compelling the selection of the candidate by the primary. Mr. Chandler won the nomination in the run-off although Thomas S. Rhea had polled more votes in the original primary than did Mr. Chandler.

So it is apparent beyond a doubt that Mr. Roosevelt recognizes the necessity for electing a Democrat, and New Deal supporters in Kentucky say that he is prepared to battle to the last ditch to accomplish it.

Nevertheless, the fur will fly in Kentucky in November. It cannot be avoided. If the administration wins, undoubtedly New Deal stock will be enhanced in value. But, if the Republican nominee should win the Kentucky test, the whole New Deal must be prepared to wear an unusual black eye.

Whale Yields New Product

What may prove to be as valuable to Norway as whale oil itself, is a new kind of meat extract made from whales. Experiments described as highly successful have been carried on in the Antarctic aboard Norwegian whalers. The greater part of the world's supply of whale oil is delivered in Norway. Although the value of whale meat as food has long been recognized only the oil of the whale has been utilized, owing to the difficulty of transporting the meat from the Antarctic. Now, however, the meat is being made into a sort of meat flour aboard the whalers. The flour is taken back to Norway, where a meat extract of a very satisfactory character is being produced.

All Must Die

Your man of genuine foresight has his cemetery lot long before he dies.

HEALTH AND GOOD LOOKS DEPEND ON HOW YOU STAND

There's beauty in good posture, declares Jeanette Eaton in the Parents' Magazine, and gives the following three reasons why the average person stands badly. First, comes the possibility of a bodily weakness. Second, part of the clothing may be uncomfortable or badly adjusted. Third, the individual is indifferent to her stoop.

It is one thing to recognize a fault and another to do something about it. Here follow a few practical "don'ts" if we would acquire good posture for ourselves or for our children.

Don't wear high heels when working or walking any distance.

Don't go upstairs clumping or stooping but hold the spine just as straight as you can.

Don't sit with legs crossed—this position puts a great strain on the muscles of back and hips.

Don't go without abdominal support unless you are taking a great deal of exercise.

Don't neglect to supply the right table, chairs and light for yourself and for your boys and girls who have homework to do—and see that their school does it, too.

As for the "dos"—here they are:

Hold your head well, chin up.

Try a little abdominal discipline.

Breathe deeply and often

Take exercise, not necessarily a daily dozen at a given period but every now and again during the day whenever it is possible to do so.

CONSUMPTION OF FATS

The total factory consumption of all animal and vegetable fats and oils in this country last year amounted to 3,355,555,000 pounds. More than one-third, 1,375,416,000 pounds went into soap manufacture. Compounds and vegetable shortenings came next, and paint and varnish third. As might be expected, the largest single item was cottonseed oil, 1,083,950,000 pounds. Next in order of large items were: Edible tallow, 585,896,000 pounds; coconut oil, 549,515,000; linseed oil, 219,746,000; palm oil, 208,547,000.

NEW WEALTH FROM SOIL

New wealth which comes from the soil is of special interest to those to whom falls the responsibility of maintaining our credit structure.

Unless agriculture is successful farm borrowers cannot ultimately succeed, neither can the banks they serve. Foreclosure sales are not a sound basis for good farming or good banking. Bankers, therefore, are as much interested in the permanent success of the agricultural industry as are the farmers, whether the deposits come directly from farm patrons, or indirectly through the ordinary channels of business.—D. Safetygrams by Fred W. Braun © The Safety Man

An automobile has never been known to leave the curb of its own accord. The causes of most automobile accidents revert back to human element - - the driver himself.

In fact the driver is responsible for most of the accidents because if his car is not in A-1 mechanical condition, he should have sense enough to fix it up.

An automobile does not run recklessly or run on the wrong side of the road or skid or cut in or pass on a curve or hill or fail to stop at a signal. Have you ever seen an automobile do all of these things of its own accord?

It takes 1500 nuts to keep an automobile together, but it takes just one nut to spread it all over over the highway.

The Alaska region, one-fifth the area of the United States, was purchased from Russia in 1867 for $7,200,000. The sensational Klondike gold rush of 1896 focused world attention on the North Yukon district, where prospectors' hardships and severe cold gave a frosty reputation to all Alaska.

Short Deer Season Fails

A proposed short season on deer this fall failed by a vote of three to two before the State Conservation Commission last Thursday.

That body declared "no emergency exists" to warrant such action.

Voting against the resolution which killed the proposal to permit a deer season were Richard R. Bailey of Virginia and Dr. B. F. Ederer of Morris. The latter said his constituency is unalterable pledged for a short annual season rather than the alternate-year deer seasons, permitted by state law.

Declaration of an 'emergency' is necessary before the commission can recommend that Governor Olson open a shooting period by executive order when not specifically provided for in existing state law.

Supporting the resolution of George W. Frederich of St. Cloud, which killed the proposal for a 1935 season were R. J. Ahlstrom of Minneapolis and John R. Foley of Wabasha, commission chairman.

Numerous communications opposing an open deer season this year were submitted at the meeting. E. V. Willard conservation commissioner, denied he ever had advocated a short deer season this fall.

Mr. and Mrs. C. F. Lindholm and daughter Eunice, and Mr. and Mrs. Albert Bennes motored to Minneapolis this week to visit with Beulah Bennes and others there for a few days.

Walter Folden is taking care of the Bennes Confectionery this week while Mr. and Mrs. Bennes are away.

A crew of surveyors have been busy out in the Mud Lake area this week checking up on a few of the corner stakes. Kenneth Swan has been assisting them with the work.

Disease Threatens Grouse

A "catastrophe" threatens Minnesota's three popular and distinct species of grouse, the ruffed grouse or native partridge, the pinnated grouse or prairie chicken, and the sharp-tailed or white-breasted grouse, according to Dr Robert G. Green of the department of bacteriology, University of Minnesota.

Dr. Green nationally known for his studies in wild life diseases, attributed the periodic disease cycle as the reason for the sudden scarcity of prairie chickens and sharp-tailed grouse in the recent open hunting seasons on these two upland game bird species.

"Although mid-summer observations indicated these game birds to be numerous in many counties the open season showed that there were but a few scattered survivors of the vast flocks of a few weeks ago," Dr. Green said.

"This disappearance of grouse was not unlooked for. It was expected but the suddenness of its occurance and its extent for prairie chickens and sharp-tailed grouse were much beyond expectation."

State game wardens conducted a survey of grouse in July at the instigation of Erling Swenson, Director of the Division of Game and Fish. Birds were reported as being plentiful and the Minnesota Conservation Commission declared an open season of eight and one-half days in 14 northern counties.

Dr. Green said that studies being conducted reveal that these wild life diseases occur in cycles and that the species given protection will return.

Geo. Fricker made a business trip to Warren on Tuesday.

Dates Set For Extra Session

Governor Olson set the date last week for the special session of the Legislature to consider social security measures for either November 19 or December 2.

If he believes there is a chance of the Legislatare finishing its work before Christmas, he will call the session for November 19, the governor said. Otherwise it will be called for December 2.

At the same time Governor Olson said he will ask Senator Charles N. Orr of St. Psul and Representative Roy E. Dunn of Pelican Rapids, majority leaders of the Senate and House, to meet him to discuss the problems to come before the special session. However, the governor asserted that any proposal for limiting the session to consideration of only certain measures must originate with the legislators themselves, as he will made no such proposal.

"It is not in my province as the executive to attempt to tell the Legislature what it shall or shall not considir at the session,' Governor Olson said. Regarding the all-important question in the minds of most legislators as to whether or not there is any possibility of compromise between the executive and the Legislature and the tax issue, the governor refused to comment.

The governor also set at rest various rumors regarding his plans for the campaign next year with this assertion:

"I am a candidate for the Farmer-Labor indorsement for United States Senator".

Various rumors afloat for the past few weeks have had the governor planning to seek a fourth term as chief executive, run for the Senate on the Democratic ticket or withdraw entirely from politics.

Duck Hunting Opens Monday

Minnesota's legion of hunters are marking time until the opening of the ringnecked pheasant season in the state on Saturday, October 19, and the migratory waterfowl hunting season on Monday, October 21.

Nine half-days of ringnecked pheasant hunting from Saturday October 19, to Sunday, October 27, both days inclusive, will be legal in 75 of Minnesota's 87 counties. A second season for the legal taking of ringnecked pheasants was declared by the Minnesota Conservation Commission for 11 half-days from November 9 to November 19, both dates inclusive, 51 counties.

Thirty days of wild duck shooting, together with other forms of migratory waterfowl opened legally this fall, await gunners with the season's opening on Monday, October 21. The waterfowl season will continue daily until Tuesday, November 19. Shooting will be permitted from 7:00 o'clock A. M. to 4:00 P. M. each day.

Bob-white quail will entice hunters into the fields in 13 counties for a period of 23 half-days extending from October 28 to November 19, both dates inclusive.

Ringnecked pheasant and quail hunting will be confined to afternoons only from 12:00 o'clock noon until sunset each day during the open seasans, Erling Swenson, Director of the Division of Game and Fish, warned.

The local school was shut down yesterday to allow the local teaching staff to attend the Northern Minnesota Educational Association convention being held at Thief River Falls yesterday and today. A very large program had been arranged for the convention and several hundred teachers and school men were expected to attend.

SYNOPSIS

Following his father's criticism of his idle life, and the withdrawal of financial assistance, Hal Ireland, son of a wealthy banker, finds himself practically without funds but with the promise of a situation in San Francisco, which he must reach, from New York, within a definite time limit. He takes passage with a cross-country auto party on a "share expense" basis. With five other members of the party, an attractive girl, Barry Trafford; middle-aged Giles Kerrigan; Sister Anastasia, a nun; and an individual whom he instinctively dislikes, Martin Crack, he starts his journey. Barry's reticence annoys him. To Kerrigan he takes at once, but he distrusts Crack. He finds his intimacy with Kerrigan ripening, and makes a little progress with Barry. Through a misunderstanding, at a stopping place, Hal is directed to Barry's room, instead of his own. Barry drops her unfriendliness and they exchange kisses. Next day he tells her he loves her. She answers that she mustn't love him, without giving any reason. Crack brutally insults Kerrigan. Hal forces him to apologize abjectly, and his feeling of enmity and disgust toward Crack is intensified.

Then, before the sun had finished its pitiless climbing, the road dropped past a gathering of bluffs with a look of Indian fighting and a more recent frontier, and came to Council Bluffs, to the broad bed of the Missouri river with its flats blackish and dry like emery, and to the end of Iowa. Across the river, there was the solidity, clamor, and business of Omaha—the first metropolis in so many swift miles that Hal for once felt like a countryman, come to gape at the sights. But black-and-white route numbers under Nebraska's covered wagon marked an escape from such frailty; and they started for Lincoln, which Kerrigan assured Hal was not on a longer way and contained something worth looking at.

It did. Straight up into the hot, broad Nebraska afternoon, a slit shaft of gray rose, dry and clean-sided, from the terrace of a square-spread building. And where the high shaft ended in its gold, blunt cap a Sower crooked his bronze arm full-muscled, a fat seedbag slung to the faintly arrogant rhythm of his shoulders, his walk sure and familiar upon the earth that received the strewn handfuls and would give them back to his labor.

Pulsipher said, "Tha—tha—that's the new state capitol, ain't it?"

"What would it be, old Gaunt," Kerrigan growled from the cigarette-corner of his mouth: "the Mauretania?"

After lunch, Barry came to the front seat beside Hal, Doc leaping eagerly to her lap.

"Kerrigan says I'm to sit here," she said.

"Bless Kerrigan," said Hal.

"He's an old peach," said Barry softly. "And he likes you a little, I think. I wonder why." Then, more freshly, "Hal, could we drive down to the capitol for one closer look at it?"

"Let's," said Hal. "Won't take a minute. You know the real way to make up your mind about it would be to sleep on your first look and see it again in the morning."

"I've made up my mind," said Barry. "I think it's grand. I could do without some of those names around the outside, and the gold behind that relief of the covered wagon over the door, and I don't think the buffaloes beside the steps are strong enough, but—"

"But outside of that you like it," said Hal, grinning. "When you get to be as old as I, you'll know one look isn't—"

"Get to be as old as—" she said, affecting difficulty with her smile. "Why, darn you, I'm old enough to be your—"

"Daughter, in some ways," said Hal blandly.

"Would you rather I changed places again?" she said. "I'm darned if I'll be put in my place by you—a mere—a mere—"

"A 'mere' will do," said Hal. "I've never been called that before, but I like it."

"What d'you know about life, anyway?" she said, rueful mockery of anger in her eyes.

Hal stopped to watch the slowly passing features of the building and said: "Well, I had a parrot during the psittacosis scare: fear of his getting the fever aged me a good deal."

"A parrot?" said Barry, quickly brightened. "Gosh, how I've wanted a parrot! All my life. Was he fun?"

"An absolute genius," said Hal. "When we get to Los Angeles, I'll telegraph for him and you shall have him." With the others all leaning to the windows, Hal turned to her and held her sobered eyes with all the eagerness which her near, actual presence commanded. "Barry," he said quickly, and very low; "I love you. I haven't told you today, and it's harder because it's more than yesterday—so much more that—"

"That you'd give me your parrot," said Barry, and a brittle stillness held her eyes, a wooden quality the lovely lips that said it.

Hal's look hardened in the shock of that treachery to his tenderness. "At least," he said after a clouded second, "you don't look as though you thought that was so funny. Why the devil did you say it?" Where had that wretched, stealthy shadow come from?

She let out the last of her breath and turned her head helplessly, staring off through the windshield while a little shining wet rimmed her lower lids. Then she leaned partly across him, as if for a last look at the capitol, her hand coming to his and taking tight hold.

"Darling, it's no use," she hurried out, so that he could barely hear her. "I'm not big enough, good enough, to pretend I don't love you. I never thought this would happen to me—never thought I'd be so scared and cowardly. It would be simple if I were strong—and it couldn't hurt any worse. Darling, we mustn't talk about it now any more. Tonight I'll tell you, my dearest—dearest: I promise I'll tell you tonight."

He kept her hand for another instant of baffled happiness, after her hold relaxed; then she leaned away, turning toward the back and saying quite coolly, "Kerrigan, did you like that statue of Lincoln on the other side?"

* * * * * * * *

They talked or not, as the moment was meant; but either way Hal knew that Barry and he were more profoundly together there—in a closeness that grew mature and strong, ready for more thrilling aspiration. Now she had said she loved him; and with that bright finality, he belted firm his prowess against any mysteries, any obstacles.

At Grand Island they crossed the Platte river—blue water among the biscuit-colored flats where you might still find the fording tracks of the covered wagons; and Rasputin droned away on Route 30 again, with the river hidden low to southward, the straight, gaunt line of the Union Pacific dwindling ahead to the hot horizon, and the lone red-and-white pylons of the air-beacons ready to police the night.

Rasputin Droned Away on Route 30.

The vigilant welcome of Barry's eyes was quickest for the live things: the red-headed, white-tailed flash of a woodpecker drew her quick "Ahhh" of tribute; the fat-bellied little creatures that scurried across the road with tremendous haste but no speed, like small mechanical toys, stirred her soft chuckling; and she called Hal and Kerrigan to admire the lonely wisdom of the single kingfishers watching from the telegraph line above the marshy ditches. The mortality here was enormous, the road continually patched with torn fur and crushed feathers; and once a swift bird swooped in a lovely arc to deliver his small, mortal impact against Rasputin's hood; Barry's muffled cry of compassion had Hal's foot hard on the brakes.

"He's dead, surely?" she said, glancing backward.

"'Fraid so," said Kerrigan.

"I'll stop if you like," said Hal.

"No," said Barry sadly, "but it seems such a poor death for him."

The sun was lower, but it was still blazing hot when they rushed by the little group that walked a shadeless, long stretch of the road. The farmer's overalls were new, his shirt white; the child asleep in his crooked brown arms wore a fresh dress, and the printed pajamas of the two elder girls following were bright and clean. Hal's thought was of the meanness of having raised that corridor of dust for them to walk in; and as he turned to speak it to Barry, Crack's indolent voice came quickly to his ear: "Notice the kid in his arms?"

"Yes," said Hal, with a short, unwelcoming nod; he hadn't thought of Crack for an hour.

There was a flat quality in Crack's next speech, as if he had exhausted the matter's interest. "It was dead," he said.

Hal suddenly felt that Crack, if he wanted to, could frighten him, and he turned aside in quick anger to mutter, "D—n it, you don't know that."

"I saw the kid," said Crack in listless obstinacy; "it was dead."

Contempt, low and briefly savage, smoldered under Barry's quick "It was not dead." Her eyes were blazing even after they had left Crack, as if what he had said were personal to her; her pursed lips lay unwillingly together, as if she tasted something turn bitter in her mouth. Crack said nothing.

Hal tried again to capture the certainty that his tainted hatred of Crack was defined within the forgettable episode of last night. It couldn't be a slowly crescent thing, begun at the journey's start. Crack was too insignificant. It must all be Hal's own reaction to a long day of driving, with the trip-window of the speedometer near a fifth fresh start. The temptation to look around at Crack, to see if his undistinguished face were still basking in the shy pleasure of things he privately knew—that persistent temptation was part of fatigue, part of his taut impatience for the night's stop and for Barry. So too were these other dim, self-conceived bogies; an unconnected wonder whether Crack might be biding his time for some little weapon of revenge for humiliation; and that old-maid's sense of a thickening imminence stealthily preparing to come upon them, just as on the long horizon there behind, the dark was preparing.

As the sun sank, the skin of a minutely detailed range of hills to the southward—tiny, like a Rockwell Kent drawing on ticket tape—turned gradually from dry, sparse green to pale copper, with sharp-edged, blue-purple shadows defined in the tight gullies. All round the plains' far edges there were wisps and drifts and high tumbles of cloud pinkened by the sun, and a lofty pile in the southeast registered the climbing shadow of evening. Then it was twilight, and somewhere under the heavy cloudbank ahead silent lightning darted.

They dined in North Platte. If it wasn't raining afterward, they would try to make a place called Ogallala, for the night.

Just before they drew up at the hotel, Barry murmured, "I'd like to wash a little, and leave Doc. Shall I meet you down here?"

"Right," said Hal, with the brittle apprehension that unless they hurried something would happen to stop them.

Barry stood there so straight and cool, talking to Kerrigan, while Hal's hasty fingers slipped on the knots of the luggage lashing. And only when the bags were down did she go into the hotel and upstairs.

The hall was hot, but Hal's well-used, unadorned room was ten degrees hotter. He slapped the radiator in passing: it was warm to touch. It occurred to him that the management might be heat-maddened to the point of running a summer furnace—until he found that the washstand, the chipped white iron of the bed, and the painted walls were all warmer than the room's atmosphere. He washed quickly and hurried down to the car again, half certain that Sister Anastasia would appear to tell him Barry was too tired to go out so late. It was already eleven.

But Barry came—alone, hatless, a reticent smile pretending to ignore the seriousness of her brave eyes. "I haven't been long, have I?" she said, squeezing his wrist as she came to him.

"Too long," he said. "Anything's too long. It's all too long. I've had twenty-six years without you, and I grudge every d—d moment."

She bowed her head, her lips involuntarily parted to reply. But she didn't. Instead she said, "You've found where the garage is?" And she added quickly: "I don't give a darn where it is. Oh, Hal, be gentle with me: help me."

The garage was just around the corner, and beyond it the town ended nakedly, the street swallowed by the dark plains like a road running into the edge of a flood. The last house was dark: they hadn't to go far to be alone. And when they stopped, Barry parted his hands with hers, leaned back between them, and joined them before her.

"Hal," she said on a wary sigh of comfort, "I'll tell you a story."

"I know a story," he whispered against her hair. "Is it about you?"

"It's about a girl much younger than I," she said: "younger in everything."

"Then why should I hear it?"

"Because it's a sort of test," Barry said. "We don't know each other so—so very well, do we? There's something I need to know before I tell you what I have to tell you. You listen to the story and tell me what you think—and then I'll know."

"Barry, it would keep," said Hal. "Tell me some other time—after we're together, alone, for good."

She pressed his hands harder against her firmness, her head turning so that her smooth cheek ran under his lips. "No," she said, and he could tell from her voice that her eyes must be closed. "Please, Hal—now."

"All right," he said. "As a favor, Barry, which I shall want returned."

"This girl," Barry began at once, but quietly: "this girl lived on the same street I did, at home; I knew her well. It doesn't matter what she looked like, except that she was pretty—perhaps before she should have been. Her father was in the bank, on town boards, a vestryman in the church. She thought she understood him, she loved him very much, and she tried to be everything to him as he was everything to her. She knew he had started humbly in his life and she knew how proud he was of the trust and respect he had in the town, how carefully he had built it all up around him and in himself. And she was proud of that for both of them. But she knew hardly anything else about him, except what she saw, because once when she asked about her mother, he made it plain in his gentle way that she wasn't to ask questions, that some day he would tell her everything she needed to know."

Barry's pressure against him relaxed a little.

Pemmican

Pemmican as made by the early buffalo hunters usually consisted of dried and jerked buffalo meat into which was pounded the dried berries of the shadbush. When properly made and cured it would last for an indefinite period.

OSCEOLA A FAVORED NAME

According to the new Columbia Encyclopedia, just issued by the Columbia Press, Osceola is the most popular Indian name for towns in the country. Arkansas, Iowa, Missouri, Nebraska and Pennsylvania all have towns of that name, it is said.

Chillicothe is the next in popularity and is found in Illinois, Missouri, Ohio and Texas. Arkansas, Iowa and Virginia all have towns called Pocahontas. Tecumseh, Shenandoah and Montezuma are Indian town names found in three states.

Some of the odd names listed for towns are Wink, Texas; Sleepy Eye, Minn.; Social Circle, Ga.; Frostproof, Fla.; What Cheer, Iowa; Cle Elum, Wash., and Itta Bena, Miss.

BANKS GET CAMERA TRAP

If a suspicious looking person cashes a check at the "paying" window, the teller may snap a photograph of the "suspect" if a new camera is adopted for use in banks. The camera, which is small, is fitted with a cowl that is inserted into the buttonhole of the teller's vest and the camera is pinned on the inside within a few inches of the teller's fingers to facilitate snapping the photograph. Thus, instead of trying to remember the features of a suspect, the teller can produce his small photograph to aid police. The camera operates silently.—Popular Mechanics.

Whether the Remedy You are taking for Headaches, Neuralgia or Rheumatism Pains is SAFE is Your Doctor. Ask Him

Don't Entrust Your Own or Your Family's Well-Being to Unknown Preparations

BEFORE you take any preparation you don't know all about, for the relief of headaches; or the pains of rheumatism, neuritis or neuralgia, ask your doctor what he thinks about it—in comparison with Genuine Bayer Aspirin.

We say this because, before the discovery of Bayer Aspirin, most so-called "pain" remedies were advised against by physicians as being bad for the stomach; or, often, for the heart. And the discovery of Bayer Aspirin largely changed medical practice.

Countless thousands of people who have taken Bayer Aspirin year in and out without ill effect, have proved that the medical findings about its safety were correct.

Remember this: Genuine Bayer Aspirin is rated among the fastest methods yet discovered for the relief of headaches and all common pains . . . and safe for the average person to take regularly.

You can get real Bayer Aspirin at any drug store—simply by never asking for it by the name "aspirin" alone, but always saying BAYER ASPIRIN when you buy.

Speeches by President on Western Trip

TRAVELING rapidly to the Pacific coast for some fishing, President Roosevelt delivered several important addresses. The first was at Fremont, Neb., where he spoke to about 15,000 farmers and was enthusiastically received. Mr. Roosevelt set forth the chief accomplishments of his administration to date, and challenged his opponents to do better. He defended the legality of the New Deal doings and made it plain that he would continue to carry on experiments for the welfare of the people. Defining his idea of constitutional government, he said its true function is "to promote the general welfare, not by interfering unduly with individual liberties, but by bringing to the aid of the individual those powers of government which are essential to assure the continuance of the inalienable rights which the Constitution is intended to guarantee. It is democracy in the good old American sense of the word."

President Roosevelt

Coming to the AAA, in which his hearers might be supposed to be most vitally interested, the President asserted that "agricultural adjustment is an expression in concrete form of the human rights those farmer patriots sought to win when they stood at the bridge at Concord, when they proclaimed the Declaration of Independence, and when they perpetuated these ideals by the adoption of the Constitution."

No matter what attempts may be made to tear it down, "the principle of farm equality expressed by agricultural adjustment will not die," the President told the crowd.

The AAA has made "honorable history," the President declared, and as a result, smoke is pouring from chimneys again and workers without regular jobs are obtaining employment.

He served notice that it is the purpose of his administration to "use every square mile of the United States for the purpose to which it is best adapted." Nature must be harnessed instead of despoiled, he asserted.

At Boulder Dam the President assisted in the dedication of the great project and delivered an address in which he announced that government spending for employment purposes was nearing its end and that now private industry must take up the burden of decreasing the army of the unemployed. He defended the administration against the charges of "boondoggling" and said its efforts "meet with the approval of the people of the nation." He touched only lightly on the power question. Secretary Ickes, who also spoke, said Boulder Dam should be re-named Johnson Dam, in honor of Senator Hiram Johnson.

Again at Los Angeles in the Hollywood Bowl and at San Diego the Chief Executive delivered adddesses, and then he went to catch some fish.

High Cost of Living Is Subject of Inquiry

OBEYING the instructions of the President, the federal trade commission has begun a survey to determine why the cost of living is mounting so high. Several members of the commission's staff started the investigation in Detroit, where the housewives staged a meat strike some weeks ago. Other members of the staff will take up the work in Chicago, and later the inquiry will be carried on in other centers. The agricultural income especially is to be investigated.

Illinois Republicans for Knox for Presidency

COL. FRANK KNOX, publisher of the Chicago Daily News, is now an accredited candidate for the Republican Presidential nomination, for he has received the indorsement of the Republican state central committee of Illinois. Colonel Knox has been in a receptive mood for a long time and has traveled all over the country making speeches. In various unofficial straw votes he has been placed second, only Senator Borah being preferred to him.

Col. Frank Knox

Addressing the Illinois central committee, Colonel Knox said: "I have been from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from West Virginia on north, and everywhere I find that the Republicans not only think that they will be victorious but they have a deep sense of responsibility to rescue the country from the hands of socialists."

Budget Summation Shows Reduction in Deficits

IN A "budget summation" given out at Washington by order of the President it is shown that the federal deficits will be reduced by more than a billion and a quarter from the original estimates, because economic conditions have grown "decidedly better" and tax receipts are higher than was expected. The estimated deficit for the current fiscal year will be $3,281,000,000.

"The prevailing rate of recovery," the President said, "points to the speedy decline of federal expenditures for emergency activities."

Unless the AAA's processing taxes are knocked out by the Supreme court, he argued, the government "will not need new taxes or increased rates in existing taxes to meet the expenses of its necessary annual operations."

Van Sweringens Recover Railway Empire

VAN SWERINGEN brothers have regained control over the vast railway and real estate empire they built and lost to New York bankers. At the height of the boom this was valued at $3,000,000,000. It was taken by a banking group when the Van Sweringens defaulted on loans of $48,000,000 and was put up at auction. The brothers regained control for $3,121,000 by bidding in the majority stock of the Alleghany corporation, holding company for all but one of the so-called Van Sweringen roads, including the Chesapeake & Ohio, Pere Marquette, Nickel Plate, Missouri Pacific, and Chicago & Eastern Illinois, and the Van Sweringen corporation through which the brothers ruled their vast real estate possessions.

War in Ethiopia Growing Nearer Day by Day

ITALY having rejected the peace plan proposed by the League of Nations committee of five, and Ethiopia having accepted it, the committee reported to the league council that its efforts to solve the problem were futile. The council thereupon held a public meeting and adopted unanimously the recommendation of its president, Enrique Ruiz Guinazu of Argentina, that it proceed under article 15 of the covenant, drafting a report and recommendations for settlement of the Italo-Ethiopian embroglio.

Anthony Eden

A feature of the council's session was an address by Capt. Anthony Eden, British minister for league affairs. Conversations in Rome between British Ambassador Sir Eric Drummond and Premier Mussolini had led some to think Great Britain was weakening, but Eden announced his government was "steadfastly determined to abide by its policy" as previously declared.

Emperor Haile Selassi wired the league requesting that in view of the "increasing provocative attitude of Italy" neutral observers be dispatched to Ethiopia to establish responsibility in case a clash occurs.

The Ethiopian ruler notified the league that he could not delay general mobilization much longer, in view of the "increasing gravity of Italian aggression," but he decided to wait a little longer for action by the league before calling to arms his warriors, whose number he estimates at 2,000,000.

Mussolini, who asserted he expected Ethiopia would soon assault Italy's colonies proceeded to put 250,000 troops in east Africa. Nearly every day vessels left for Eritrea carrying large bodies of soldiers. On one of them went Prince Adelberto of Savoy, cousin of King Victor Emmanuel. In addition to the Italian troops, Mussolini will have half as many native fighters from Eritrea and Somaliland. The duce intimated he would quit the League of Nations if it took any action against Italy, but he also offered to negotiate an accord with Great Britain.

The British asked France to define its attitude should any nation attack the empire, and soon after Sir Samuel Hoare replied to France's questions regarding the British attitude toward possible trouble on the continent. The foreign secretary assured France that Great Britain would always support collective action against any aggressor.

Florida Narrowly Escapes Another Hurricane

ANOTHER fierce hurricane from the Caribbean swept across the middle part of Cuba, causing more than a score of deaths and doing vast property damage, and then seemed to be heading directly for southern Florida. The residents there made all possible preparations for safety, but the storm suddenly veered and roared off to the northeast over the Atlantic.

Liner Goes Aground but No Lives Are Lost

THE Holland-American liner Rotterdam, on a West Indian pleasure cruise, went aground on Morant Cays, 40 miles east of Jamaica, in fine weather, because of "an unaccountable shift" in the current. Her 460 passengers and 250 members of the crew were safely and comfortably transferred to the British steamer Ariguani and landed at Kingston, Jamaica. The Rotterdam was little injured.

WHY BAY TURNS YELLOW

La Jolla Bay, near San Diego, Calif., had this summer a visitation of "yellow water," unique in that region both because of the prominence of yellow and the extremely small size of the causative organism, says the Collecting Net, published in the interests of marine biological laboratories. No satisfactory identification of this organism has been obtained. Individuals had a length of only about six-thousandths of a millimeter. They had four flagella. The case was also remarkable on account of the entire absence of other plankton organisms during the period of its noted abundance, from about July 27 to August 7.

Safetygrams

By Fred W. Braun © The Safety Man

Uniformity of traffic regulations throughout all the states in the Union is advisable.

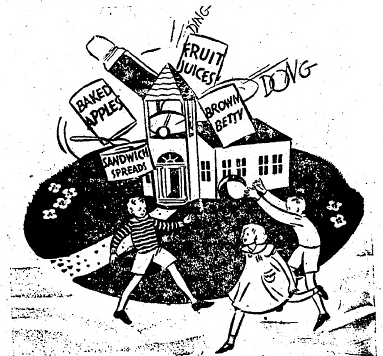
Traffic regulations for various cities, counties, and other communities can be built up so that people traveling from Wisconsin to California will find the regulations applying throughout the trip.

It would also have a tendency to control traffic better and there by be much safer. Uniformity in signs and other information on driving and directions should also be made.

This is especially true of the electric stop and go lights. Practically every community has a different set and series, and it is coefusing to drivers traveling through the various states to control their driving because of lack of lack of acquaintance with the requirments.

Uniformity will be safer.

Walter Larson had a close call at the creamery the other day when a steam pipe burst as he was tightening up a leak. He scalded his left arm so that he was laid up for a short time.



SCHOOL LUNCHES

That Ring The Bell

THEY don't creep like snails "unwillingly to school" any more. Watch them. It's a sunny day in September. There's a campus and an athletic field around even the most humble school house. There's a basket ball game to be played before school; there's an orchestra rehearsal scheduled before the nine o'clock bell rings; or there's a marble game tournament to be decided, or something else nice that's very, very important.

Modern educators have seen to that. And they've done a good job of it. They've made school not merely a preparation for life, but a life right now—living in a big, big way.

Give Mother a Hand

Mothers, too, have done their part. They have organized Parent-Teacher's associations to co-operate. And they've studied the problem of dietetics, so that the foods which this important generation eats will best equip them for these interesting and healthful activities.

Lunch boxes are no longer carriers of something to merely "hold you over" until the evening dinner hour. They are exciting little adventures in themselves containing good things that you devour. It is easier today than it used to be, to prepare these lunches. There are canned fruit juices and thermos bottles to keep them cold; there are canned sandwich spreads and sliced bread to spread them on. There are even such new foods in cans as Brown Betty, or baked apples. There are wooden or paper spoons to eat these delicious desserts with, so that even boys who don't like to carry spoons back home again can enjoy eating desserts and toss away the spoons.

Hot or Cold?

If you live near enough the school, or the school bus, a hot home lunch is better, as a regular thing. But if not, it isn't difficult to prepare a carry-lunch that will rival the home-served noonday meal. Here are some menu suggestions for both sorts:

Cigarettes give a lot of pleasure to a lot of people.

More cigarettes are smoked today because more people know about them—they are better advertised.

But the main reason for the increase is that they are made better—made of better tobaccos; then again the tobaccos are blended—a blend of Domestic and Turkish tobaccos.

Chesterfield is made of mild, ripe tobaccos. Everything that science knows about is used in making it a milder and better-tasting cigarette.

We believe you will enjoy them.

Axel Nelson Died Suddenly

The people of Holt and community were shocked on Friday evening to hear of the sudden death of Axel Nelson, Mr. Nelson appeared in good health and had been busy all day fixing up his place and had not complained of any illness.

Mr. Nelson just moved back here a week ago with his family from North Dakota where they had made their home for the past ten years. He had bought back his old home here and was busy fixing it up and mentioned to his friends that he was more than happy to be back in Holt.

He leaves to mourn his loss wife, three sons and two daughters all at home.

Funeral services were held from the Nazareth Lutheran Church on Wednesday afternoon. Rev. Redal officiated. Interment was made in the Ridge cemetery. Gunheim and Larson had charge of the arrangements.

Mud Lake Resolution

At a meeting held at the Village of Holt on the evening of Oct. 16, 1935 there was a thorough discussion of the proposed migratory water fowl refuge in the area east of Holt known as Mud Lake before a large assembly of citizens from the Holt and Middle River communities, The result of the discussion was the passage of the following resolution, by overwhelming majority.

Be It Reselved, by this meeting of citizens from these Holt and Middle River communities held at the village of Holt on Oct. 16, 1935, That we object to the migratory water fowl project in the Mud Lade area and especially to the inadequate awards made by the commissioners therein for the following reasons, to-wit:

1. It is reactionary from the viewpoint of the farmer;
2. It tends to restore a wilderness too close to civilization;
3. It would destroy itself anyway by the formation of peat again;
4. It will restore mosquitoes as well as ducks and geese;
5. It will restore water-logged soil far beyond the area now condemned;
6. It is taking property without adequate compensation being made therefor;
7. It puts the state into the business of raising meat producing fowl and fish in competition with producers of other meats;
8. It will injure two villages and possibly two more to the east by limiting the territory ~~from which~~ marketable farm produce comes;
9. It will not effect the climate to any noticeable extent;
10. It will not restore fertility to old lands;
11. It will not ease the tax burden on other real estate as the causes of this condition are of a general nature;
12. The question of whether a State may condemn lands for the use of the Federal Government is now before the U. S. Supreme Court on an appeal from the high court of the State of New York;
13. During dry years especially the Mud Lake area has furnished very valuable supplies of hay for stockmen near and far;
14. This area and adjacent lands affected are not sub-marginal lands with relation to production of grasses, grass seeds, cattle, sheep and butterfat and wool;
15. This project does not involve the conservation of BENEFICIAL natural resources and the awards will not rehabilitate the present inhabitants in the area from the net amounts after deducting indebtedness on account of bonded towns and school districts and tax delinquencies.
16. Limiting productive areas at home to help other communities, states and countries is inconsistent and inequitable in the distribution of privilege.

Be It Further Resolved that a copy hereof be given to the press, the Commissioner of Conservation, the Biological Survey Bureau of the U. S. Department of Apriculture, the Judge ef the Fourteenth Judicial District and the County Board of the County of Marshall.

Geo. Fricker
Chairman of said meeting.

Tollefsrud's Had Auto Spill

Mr. and Mrs. Elling Tollefsrud and their daughter Elaine had a close call on Sunday evening when their car rolled over off of the high grade near the old Carl Surmo farm in Mud Lake. They were on their way to the S. Tharaldson home to get their daughter Vernice when the accident happened. Mr. Tollefsrud was blinded by smoke from a peat fire near the road and as the grade is narrow and high at this point he got too close to the south edge and the car went over. The car was badly damaged but all the occupants escaped without being hurt with the exception of Mr. Tollefsrud who had one of his ears cut by broken glass.

Mrs. Clara King Died

Mrs. Clara King passed away at the home of hes brother, Fred Wegge on Tuesday morning. She had been ill for some time and the past week complications set in from which she was unable to recover.

Funeral services will be conducted from the Nazareth Lutheran church this afternoon at 2 o'clock.

Alfred Simonson had a close call when his car tipped over into the deep ditch north of the Bungalow school house on Wednesday evening of last week as he was coming home from a business trip to Gatzke. Mr. Simonson received some bad cuts in the face from broken glass. The car was badly damaged.

Edward Erickson, Ringbo farmer, and his sons Eli and Lester and daughter, Mrs. Carl Knutson of Randeen, returned home Sunday from a weeks visit with relatives at Fort Peck, Montana. They reported that the new Government dam at that place was a gigantic project well worth seeing.

Boost For The Boy Scouts

The Holt Boy Scout troop 112 had a big time on Saturday evening when they staged an outdoor supper and camp fire get-together in the woods west of the village.

Some of the boys were taking their cooking tests and had to fry a quarter pound of beef on a flat stone and bake two potatoes in the hot coals of the fire without burning any of them in order to pass the test.

They also had a bean pot test and some of the boys had stayed in the woods all day, taking shifts, to keep the fires burning so the beans would be baked.

To make it a big camp meeting and outdoor doing all the scout boys took part and fried their stakes and baked potatoes for supper.

Besides the Scout Master, A. C. Larson and his assistant Hartley Peterson, H. O. Hanson was a member of the group that enjoyed the meal.

The scouts are going to build a permanent camp here in the village and every business man and interested individual will be asked to cooperate in the well worth project. Those men who have sons in the troop should get behind the project and help the boys get a good log cabin built. The logs have been donated for the cabin and the scouts have already cut a lot of them. Lets build a cabin now.

Mr. and Mrs. A. Bennes and Mr. and Mrs. C. Lindholm and daughter Eunice returned home Friday from the Twin Cities where they spent a few days.

The Christianson Brothers are busy plowing up a hundred acres of field on the C. O. Saastad farm. They will farm the place on share with Mr. Saastad next year.

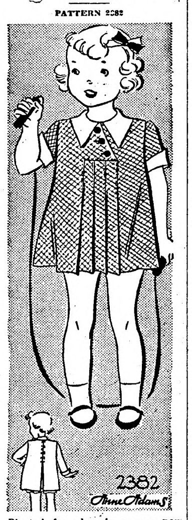
Smart Play Frock That's Easy to Sew

PATTERN 2382



Pleated for play, in a very new way, this child's frock gives her plenty of room for rope-skipping. Her mother will find this smart frock so easy to cut and put together, and a very economical pattern, since bloomers are included with the dress. You can make these up in the same material, or just plain white to wear with other frocks, and no child can have too many pairs. The buttoned closing of the frock takes a new slant, and don't worry about those four pleats! They're as easy a decoration as you've ever made. Colorful novelty cotton for that crisp look and a choice of short or long sleeves.

Pattern 2382 is available in sizes 2, 4, 6 and 8. Size 6 takes 2½ yards 36 inch fabric and ⅜ yard contrasting. Illustrated step-by-step sewing instructions included.

Send FIFTEEN CENTS (15c) in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for this pattern. Write plainly name, address and style number. BE SURE TO STATE SIZE.

SYNOPSIS

Following his father's criticism of his idle life, and the withdrawal of financial assistance, Hal Ireland, son of a wealthy banker, finds himself practically without funds but with the promise of a situation in San Francisco, which he must reach, from New York. He takes passage with a cross-country auto party on a "share expense" basis. Other members of the party include an attractive girl, Barry Trafford; middle-aged Giles Kerrigan; Sister Anastasia, a nun; and an individual whom he instinctively dislikes, Martin Crack. Barry's reticence annoys him. To Kerrigan he takes at once, but he distrusts Crack. He finds his intimacy with Kerrigan ripening, and makes a little progress with Barry. Through a misunderstanding, at a stopping place, Hal is directed to Barry's room, instead of his own, and they exchange kisses. Next day he tells her he loves her. She answers that she mustn't love him, without giving any reason. Crack brutally insults Kerrigan. Hal forces him to apologize abjectly, and his feeling of enmity and disgust toward Crack is intensified. Barry promises Hal that next day she will reveal the shadow of despair that hangs over her.

"One day," Barry went on, as if making sure it should all be as simple and clear for him as it was for her, "her father brought a man to live in their house—a pleasant, quiet sort of man, a good deal younger than her father but older than she. The man was away a good deal, but even when he was at home the girl hardly saw him except at breakfast and dinner; in the evening he used to read his paper while she and her father played cards and talked, as they always had.

"Then one day her father told her that the man had asked him his consent to their marriage—the girl's and the lodger's. Her father had given it. He treated it so much as an ordinary matter that, even without warning, the girl had no real feeling about it one way or the other. And her father wanted it. So they were married, quietly, right away, she being just under seventeen and her husband a little past thirty. For more than a year there was hardly any difference in her life: she give up her beaus, counted her husband's laundry and sewed on his buttons as she did for her father. It was like a sort of dream—not happy, not unhappy—that doesn't seem worth breaking down because you know it is a dream and that you'll wake up soon.

"Then her father was taken ill—very ill—so that the doctor told her she must think of his dying. She couldn't—not possibly—it filled her with such panic. It filled her so dreadfully, so desperately, that she never wondered what would happen between her and her—husband. One night her father called her to him; he asked her to promise that she would stick to her husband no matter what happened, do what he wanted her to do, no matter what it was, never leave him nor disobey him, for ten years. She promised; and then in his weakness and fever her father forgot about it and begged her to promise all over again. It was so terribly important to him—really terribly—terror mixed up in it. And while she stayed watching him after she'd promised, her father died."

A dog barked in the still, hot town and the dark, sleeping silence of the plains lay out and away before them forever under the starless black of the sky.

"Later," said Barry quietly, "when she began to believe that it had happened, she told her husband she would try to love him, if he would wait—try to love him for the friendship and trust her father must have had for him, to make her promise that. Her husband laughed at her as if she were a fool; he said, 'He made you promise that because he wanted to keep his respectability in h—l with him, and I can have it back whenever I like.' He showed her a paper, a sort of receipt that was practically a confession of something her father had done before he'd come here, in another bank—an acknowledgment that her husband had covered it up for him.

"That was four years ago. Her contract still has six years to run, and what she'll be when it ends— Her husband's plans are definite enough—to make money for him, and power for him, in the ways he finds. The four years have been mostly a sort of schooling for that, with a few little—try-outs."

She paused only an instant. "I'd like to help her, but there's no way, you see. Disillusion at nineteen doesn't seem to drown nineteen years of love and reverence, and a—a superstition about promises, about a sort of honor even in dishonor."

The black spread of darkness before them was oppressive, stealthy in oppression, and Hal tightened his arms to make sure she was still there against him. He had shut the meanings of the story out of his mind, but he shouldnt have let even the words come in—the deliberate, simple words that softly infected his unacknowledged fears. Now he must say what would slip the secreted leashes on their going-on together, over the near, elusive threshold of enchantment. Then Barry said steadily, "That's the story, Hal. What do you think?"

"It's improbable," said Hal at once, "and banal and wickedly irrelevant to what my heart and the whole world is full of. Barry—"

Within his arms, she turned quickly and stopped back his words with her smooth, urgent lips. He could feel her breast move with her breathing, close against his—almost feel her pulses join his to use one rhythm for what, in that transported moment, was a single surging of life. Then her lips evaded him, her cheek pressed hard against his, and he heard her whispering.

"You see, I'm not strong enough, brave enough to tell you you aren't the person with whom I want to spend the rest of my life, anyway, anyhow—that you won't always be the only person, no matter what can happen in this whole wide green world, or in heaven, or in hell. My own darling. I love you. That's all there is. To say I love you most or best or dearest makes the word cheap, and it can never be cheap again. I can never use it again—except for you. I love you, and I haven't been strong or honest or brave for you. O G—d," she said in a final cry, "perhaps I'm glad I haven't been."

With sudden, frantic strength, she tore herself out of his arms and was gone from him, into the waiting darkness.

CHAPTER VII

Sunday

It was only quarter to six, but Sister Anastasia was waiting for Hal at the head of the stairs, the serenity of her cool, close-framed face concerned with sorrow as she watched him.

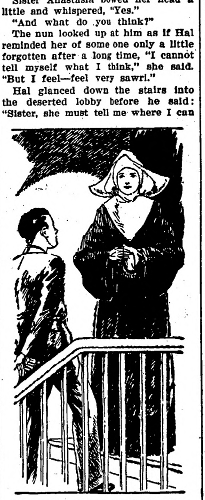
"She has told you," Hal said quietly when he came to her.

Sister Anastasia bowed her head a little and whispered, "Yes."

"And what do you think?"

The nun looked up at him as if Hal reminded her of some one only a little forgotten after a long time, "I cannot tell myself what I think," she said. "But I feel—feel very sawri."

Hal glanced down the stairs into the deserted lobby before he said: "Sister, she must tell me where I can find this—husband, and I must see him. I can buy him, or—or I can—but I needn't tell you that. I can buy him. He is for sale."



"She Is Beautiful In Her Spirit: She Must Not Be Driven Closer to—"

"She will not tell you," said Sister Anastasia, saddened by her helplessness. "She would not tell me. All she will say is that he is not waiting for her in California."

"I shall find him," said Hal.

"She asked me to ask a favor of you," said the nun, as if she hadn't heard him, and Hal drew an uncomfortable breath. "I think you will do it for her. She did not sleep last night."

"I will do anything in the world for her," said Hal, "except one thing."

"It is not the one thing," said Sister Anastasia. "It is only that you will for today—for twenty-four hours—not speak of your love, not ask her to speak of hers. She must rest—inside she must rest, to find where she is, now that you are together. She is nearer to—to despair than—than she should be. She is beautiful in her spirit: she must not be driven closer to—"

Hal gave her a quick, acute glance and saw that she believed what she had started to say. He looked down the stairs again, the sleeping quiet of the shabby hotel grown subtly perilous; then he returned his look to the nun's and said, "I promise."

She had known he would, and known that it would solve nothing below the surface of today. "Our bags are ready, if—if you like to take them down," she said. "That is the room—there." And she moved to the stairs—not because of connivance in anything she shouldn't watch, but because she wholly trusted him to care for Barry.

Hal knocked, and Barry opened the door to him—her blue eyes deep and alone, but sure, almost hopeful in their brave quiet. He managed a free smile of greeting and said, "Morning, my—Dietrich. Bags: was told there were bags."

She held out her hand, her arm straightened from the good, wide shoulder, her smile cheering her eyes with gratefulness. She took his hand in both of hers, brought it to her cheek, and turned her lips to it. Then she let it go as if it were something she were entrusting to him. "There are the bags," she said, pointing.

She stood by the door, her golden head high, the thick bush of half-curls touching her smooth, faintly dipped cheeks. He stopped before her, met her brief acknowledgment of intimacy with conscious sedateness.

"You see, don't you?" she said, as if she had been explaining it to him. "Los Angeles will be the end of everything. There's a little time of beauty left. We shouldn't waste it in making ourselves miserable over what we can't have."

His gray eyes stayed out of reach of her appeal. "Barry," he said steadily, "there's nothing we can't have."

Kerrigan kept them waiting a little this morning. Barry took her old place in the tonneau, and Hal played a stalking game with Crack round the car, in the sweetish pungency of the waked exhaust. Crack, he felt, was edging up to hint a desire to ride in the front seat; and Crack sitting beside him, drowsily seeming to follow his impossible groping for actuality in the fiction of Barry's marriage—the prospect of it made Hal flinch and shudder. Then, without chagrin, Crack surrendered to Hal's casual keeping the car between them, bounced his golf-ball once on the pavement, and climbed into the tonneau. Hal couldn't remember having seen him recover his silly plaything in the speak-easy that other night: perhaps he carried a supply. Hal wondered if new golf-balls gleaming in a box would now always remind him of Crack and his. . . . Then Kerrigan came.

"And how are you, colonel?" Hal asked as they started.

"Like the mouth of a factory chimney," said Kerrigan, scrubbing the red filigree of his tough cheeks and blinking cheerful appraisal of the morning. "'How's that, Mr. Kerrigan?' the young man asked, eager for a fresh token of his kindly old friend's wit. 'Why, bless you,' said dear Mr. Kerrigan, radiating goodwill toward all, 'top-hole is the answer: what else?' And with that gay quip and a gleam of benign mischief in his nice old eyes, he went off—lippity loppity—in the direction of Mr. MacGregor's carrot patch."

There was dust up already on the long road, and the high haze gathered as the morning light lost its slant and its freshness. Occasionally cattle trucks, and the mule teams that still held tractors' berths on the less frequent farms, gave no impression of being out unduly early; and the threshing equipment in one of the roadside fields looked as if it had been puffing chaff all through the hot night. Nebraska was under slow change for the farther West, the stark, dry railroad and its vertical fringe of pole line still leading the way to the eternal horizon.

It was somewhere east of Cheyenne that Hal felt a silent, unseen magic putting more momentous difference under the sky; and accidentally he glanced up—above the haze of the horizon—and saw the source of it: dim, sloped patches of white incredibly high on the far peaks of a mountain range. They stayed far away there, still and lofty above the earth's haze; and Rasputin's prodigious charge against them over the driven song of steel and rubber became a small, peevish crawling in infinity.

"Mountains," said Crack quietly behind Hal's head, as if it were a warning, as if there were some necessity for new and subtle vigilance.

At the filling station where they stopped in Cheyenne, Kerrigan said: "What I want to arrange some day is this: a personal archangel who'll zoop down to you every so often when you're in a new town, or an old one you like, and say to you: 'Baby, you need a tonic; here you are in Cheyenne; I can't help that, but if you'll pick any day of its past that you'd like to see, I'll get you a ringside seat right in it.'"

"Know any archangels?" said Hal. "What would you pick here?"

"Ever hear of the Gold Room?"

"No, what was that?"

"Jim Allen's Place," said Kerrigan almost wistfully: "the big hidy-ho establishment out here in the days when you had to know your way around to support life. I'd want to be around there the day the first U. P. train rolled into town back in '67. Think of the time all the gals and the guys must have had that day, Mr. Ireland; and think of the gals and guys they must have been that had the time.

"You've got something there," said Hal, watching the gusto which Kerrigan's eyes made authentic and infectious. "Gold Room itself's torn down by now, I s'pose."

A hollow click sounded on the pavement behind and Hal had to keep himself from turning too smartly. Crack stood there holding the little ball where he had caught it; his lips were in their slight smile, his eyes showed Hal their slight, drowsy mischief.

"Everything's tight and smooth, 'ey?" he said, as if he knew Hal thought so, but wanted to commit him to it.

"Far's I know," said Hal.

"'Twouldn't be good to get stuck out there where we're goin'," Crack said.

Caves for the storage of winter food are common equipment of corn belt communities.

ARABIC IN EVERYDAY USE

Housewives of the world use Arabic in everyday conversation, said Dr. Henry Farmer when he lectured at Glasgow university, Glasgow, on "Arabian Influence on Western Civilization," recently. "Housewives, for instance, scarcely imagine that when they talk of sugar, cotton, damask, taffeta, orange, muslin, lozenge and perhaps soap and the loofa, they are using Arabic words," he continued. "Men of learning use Arabic continually, probably without knowing it. In medicine, 'alcohol' and 'alembic' and hosts of other words are pure Arabic, and again, when astronomers speak of 'zenith' and 'nadir,' and mathematicians of 'algebra' and 'cipher,' they are using Arabic words."

IT'S NOT IN MANY CEREALS

● Nothing anyone eats is more important than Vitamin B—the vitamin for keeping fit. Yet it isn't in many cereals, when cereals are supposed to be our best source of this food element.

Many are nervous, poor in appetite, system out of order, because their daily diets lack enough of the precious Vitamin B for keeping fit.

Few things keep them back like a lack of this protective food element.

So give everyone Quaker Oats every morning. Because in addition to its generous supply of Vitamin B for keeping fit, it furnishes food-energy, muscle and body-building ingredients. For about ½c per dish.

Start serving it tomorrow for a 2-weeks test. Quaker Oats has a wholesome, nut-like, luscious appeal to the appetite. Flavory, surpassingly good. All grocers supply it.

CHEAP LABOR

The bridge built in 1772 which carries the western highway over the Seine at Neuilly-Sur-Seine, France, has become inadequate for modern traffic and is to be replaced. The new bridge, however, is likely to be more costly than the old. Accounts still preserved show that the contractor in 1772 paid his masons 46 cents, carpenters 45 cents, and laborers 26 cents a day, and they were not 8 hour days, either. But living was cheaper then.

The proper treatment for a bilious child

THREE STEPS TO RELIEVING CONSTIPATION
I II III
A cleansing dose today; a smaller quantity tomorrow; less each time, until bowels need no help at all.

ANY mother knows the reason when her child stops playing, eats little, is hard to manage. Constipation. But what a pity so few know the sensible way to set things right!

The ordinary laxatives, of even ordinary strength, destroy all hopes of restoring regularity.

A liquid laxative is the answer, mothers. The answer to all your worries over constipation. A liquid can be measured. The dose can be exactly suited to any age or need. Just reduce the dose each time, until the bowels are moving of their own accord and need no help.

This treatment will succeed with any child and with any adult.

• Doctors use a liquid laxative. Hospitals use the liquid form. If it is best for their use, it is best for home use. The liquid laxative they generally use is Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. Any druggist has it.

DOAN'S PILLS

CARE IN CHOOSING BOOKS FOR CHILD HAS ITS REWARD

The story of Abraham Lincoln and his struggle for education gives the cue to Alma H. Jones' article, "Satisfy Your Child's Book Hunger," in Hygeia.

"Books are to the mind what sunshine is to the body," implies that just as the well cared for child receives daily sun exposure as an aid to physical growth, so also should he receive early "exposure" to lullabies, rhymes and stories, which constitute aids to mental and emotional growth.

Very early the child needs to establish right attitudes toward books. By the time a child is fifteen or eighteen months old he can easily learn to handle a book without tearing the pages, if the paper is strong and the pages are not too large. Young children who are not yet able to read enjoy picture books or picture-story books.

Though considerable emphasis is placed on the importance of children of school age reading for themselves and in quantity this should not be interpreted as a reason for ending the reading or story-telling hour of parents and other adults. Through such means the young boy or girl may be stimulated to more difficult reading on new subjects, for the parent or adult may interpret through voice or explanation much that would otherwise be lost on the child who does not read easily. There is permanent value as well as present pleasure in the story hour.

The general characteristics of a good book include large clear type, an uncrowded, well-paragraphed page, a pleasing appearance, a lively tale and a well-sustained reader interest.

Savant Has Theory on Origin of the Alphabet

The Phoenicians, long credited with the invention of the alphabet, probably borrowed their writings from a system in use among the Israelites, Sir Charles Marston, the British archeologist, believes.

Among the recent archeological evidence which throws new light on the origin of the alphabet is the discovery last summer of a new script among the ruins of an Egyptian temple in the Near East, Sir Charles said in a recent interview.

The new writing was found on a water jar at Tell Duweir, believed to be the Biblical city of Lachish, near Jerusalem.—Washington Star.

New Cotton Use Found

Consumer packings of bulky farm products—potatoes, citrus fruits, onions—is providing an important new outlet for cotton. The Department of Agriculture estimates that more than 10,000,000 cotton bags were used for consumer packages of potatoes alone last year.

Three-Wheeled Auto

Built by a young Minneapolis mechanic during spare time, a three-wheeled streamline automobile driven by a standard four-cylinder motorcycle engine has defied deliberate attempts to upset it, says Popular Mechanics. Taking curves at high speed it tipped to a 45-degree angle without turning over.

The car is 46 inches high and accommodates two passengers. It will travel 85 miles an hour and run 40 miles to a gallon of gasoline. The engine is at the rear, leaving space for battery, tank and luggage under the hood. Conventional controls and front-wheel steering are provided. Frame, body and top are all steel. The motor is cooled by air scooped through vents in the top.

World's Most Famous Babies Eat Oatmeal

The Dionne Quintuplets, wards of the King, eat the same cereal that is eaten by millions of babies who don't get their names in the papers—oatmeal. The Canadian government chose a staff of special experts for the care of the Quints. And these experts, their scientific knowledge endorsing the instinctive choice of mothers the world over, have chosen oatmeal for the cereal of the famous five.

Oatmeal, eminent medical authorities agree, has an abundance of everything a child's cereal should have—body-building minerals, muscle-building protein, and the supremely important Vitamin B for keeping fit.

Food science says that Vitamin B is the best safeguard against those dangerous enemies of childhood—nervousness, constipation, and poor appetite due to lack of that vitamin in the diet.

Now It's Rat Fur

It needn't be a matter for surprise if you learn that some new curly fur on the market with a fancy name came from an animal the ancestors of which are traceable to the common rat. For a curly-coated variety of these rodents has been developed at Wistar Institute, the University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, by Dr. Helen Dean King, who has been making a study of the breeding of rats for scientific purposes. Among her rats are breeds with chocolate, cinnamon and pale lapin colored coats.

DOMESTICATED WOLVES

The Moscow zoo boasts of two wolves which apparently are as tame and trustworthy as dogs. They were captured when they were puppies and ever since have been given kind and patient training. Their utter lack of viciousness and desire to return to their native element seems to indicate the fallacy of the belief that grown wolves become dangerous even though they have been trained from puppyhood.—Pathfinder Magazine.

School Notes

High School Notes

Report cards were handed out on Wednesday. The following pupils are on the Honor Roll: Junior: Eleanor Peterson, Gertrude Nohre.

Sophomore: Glenn Carlson, Beatrice Larson.

Freshmen: Alfred Stienhauer, Opal Werner, Marian Larson.

The High School students are having a campaign selling subscriptions to several magazines. The students were divided into two groups, the Dragons and the Badgers. Each side is taxing their best to win.

Were we glad to get back to school again? Ask the pupils? Most of them came to school sort of sleepy-eyed on Monday. Did they take advantage of the vacation? They must have, especially the nights.

The Freshmen are giving the Upperclassmen a masquerade party Friday evening. We are all planning to have a grand old time.

...but after all is said and done, it's the cigarette itself that counts

... the question is, does it suit you?

Now, when it comes to a cigarette that will suit you ... you want to think whether it's mild, you want to think about the taste

That Chesterfields are milder and taste better is no accident ...

The farmer who grows the tobacco, the warehouseman who sells it at auction to the highest bidder, every man who knows about leaf tobacco will tell you that it takes mild, ripe tobaccos to make a good cigarette.

In making Chesterfields we use mild ripe home-grown and Turkish tobaccos.

Attended Federation Meet

Several members of the Ladies Aid of the Nazareth Lutheran church here motored to Greenbush on Wednesday of last week to attend the Women's Missionary Federation meeting held at the Lutheran church there. Those from here who attended were: Mrs. Geo Fricker, Mrs. H. O. Hanson, Mrs. J. Knutson, Mrs. O. Backlund, Mrs. H. Moberg, Mrs. L. Wegge, Mrs. S. Lorentson and Mrs. G. Sanoden.

Miss Clara Sandberg, Miss Greta Fredrickson and Miss Gladys Sanoden also went there as delegates to the Little Daughters of Reformation (Dorcas Society) convention, which held its first meeting of this kind in this circuit.

Mr. and Mrs. C. H. Gunheim, Mrs. L. M. Redal, Mrs. O. Nohre and Miss Ethel Nohre motored up there for the evening banquet and session.

Mr. and Mrs. A. O. Aspelin, pioneer farmers of the Randen community, moved here a short time ago. They have rented the former Mrs. Anderson residence in the east part of town. Their daughter Caroline who is assistant cashier at the bank here will make her home with them.

The first day that they were here Mr. Aspelin had a close call when a car traveling at a good speed struck his Ford pickup as he was crossing the highway at the main intersection. Both cars were damaged but the occupants were unhurt.

Elling Tollefsrud has sold his 80 acre farm southeast of Holt to his brother-in-law, Arthur Larson. Mr. and Mrs. Tollefsrud and daughters are planning a trip to the west coast in a short time.

From reports received here the many socials held at the rural schools around here the past two weeks, have enjoyed good crowds and neat proceeds.

Celebrated 50th Anniversary

Mr. and Mrs. K. T. Knutson, pioneer couple of this community, were pleasantly surprised on Sunday, October 27, when a large crowd of relatives, friends, and neighbors tendered them a reception at the Nazareth Lutheran church in honor of their fiftieth wedding anniversary.

Mr. and Mrs. Knutson were married at Ada, Norman county, Minnesota, on December 7, 1885. They spent many years on their farm near Gary and Mr. Knutson also served the people of Norman county as county treasurer for two terms about forty years ago.

In 1908 they moved to Holt and have seen this part of the county develop from a brushy swampy wilderness to a thriving farm community, and they have become known to be one of the oldest, most honored and respected families of Holt.

The anniversary program rendered was as follows:

Talk — Rev. Redal
Song — Edna Olson, Ruth Gilbertson and Genevieve Lee accompanied by Ruth Olson on the organ
Norwegian Duet — Mrs. H. O. Hanson and Mrs. O. H. Nohre
Poem — Mrs. Paul Olson
Talk — Mrs. A. B. Anderson
Song — "The Old Spinning Wheel" by Avis and Harriet Knutson
Talk — Judge M. A. Brattland of Thief River Falls.
Song — Male Quartet
Reading — 'At Grandmas House' by Avis Knutson
Letter of Greeting from Rev. M. B. Ordahl of Glenfield, No. Dak. read by Rev. Redal
Song — Male Quartet
Talk — Supt. E. O. Nybakken
Presentation of a Gift by Rev. Redal
Song — Ladies Quartet

Delores Engen was flower girl Gladys Sanoden played the processional.

After the program the Ladies Aid served a bounteous lunch to the large crowd.

The church parlors were beautifully decorated in orange, brown and yellow with the main attraction being a special table set for twenty-four people, including the honor guests, their sons and daughters and close relatives and old friends.

A two course lunch was served with the center piece consisting of a huge wedding cake. Gold Chrysathemums at each end of the table carried out the color scheme.

All the sons and daughters of Mr. and Mrs. Knutson were here except their son Fritz. He was unable to get here from South Dakota.

A host of their friends and relatives from North Dakota, Gary, Crookston, Mahnomen, Chisago City, Thief River Falls, Middle River and Stephen were present for the occassion.

Mr. and Mrs. Knutson were presented with a cash purse as a rememberance of the day.

We extend congratulations.

Card of Thanks

We hereby express our heartfelt thanks to all our relatives, neighbors and friends for the wonderful surprise given us on Sunday at the Nazareth Lutheran church on our 50th wedding anniversary. Especially do we thank those who took part in the program, those who had charge of the arrangement and those who gave the cash purse.

Mr. and Mrs. K. T. Knutson.

IN MEMORIAM

In loving memory of our dear husband and father who passed away November 7, 1933.

A place is vacant in our midst,
That never can be filled;
God in his wisdom has recalled,
A voice we loved is still.
More and more each day we miss him
Friends may think the wound is healed;
But they little know that sorrow
Lies within our hearts concealed.
We cannot forget you, oh dearest father,
Tho long may seen the years;
And often in the lonely hours;
We wipe away the tear.

Sadly missed by
Mrs. S. H. Nohre and family.

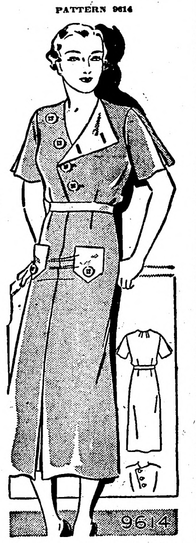
"Well Begun's Half Done" When Making Your House Frock

PATTERN 9614



There was never a truer phrase than that, and how well it applies here! For before you know it your dress is cut and ready to stitch. This pattern is so easy to follow. There's everything new about the lines of this fetching house frock, with its contrasting surplice facing and doesn't it look like a different dress when buttoned up to the neck, see small sketch—with those enormous buttons? When household chores are finished, button up the deep pointed surplice and wear the frock to market. It's smart enough. Try it in colorful novelty cotton or gingham.

Pattern 9614 may be ordered only in sizes 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46. Size 36 requires 4 yards 36 inch fabric and ¾ yard contrasting. Complete diagrammed sew chart included.

SYNOPSIS

Following his father's criticism of his idle life, and the withdrawal of financial assistance, Hal Ireland, son of a wealthy banker, finds himself practically without funds but with the promise of a situation in San Francisco, which he must reach, from New York. He takes passage with a cross-country auto party on a "share expense" basis. Other members of the party include an attractive girl, Barry Trafford; middle-aged Giles Kerrigan; Sister Anastasia, a nun; and an individual whom he instinctively dislikes, Martin Crack. Barry's reticence annoys him. To Kerrigan he takes at once, but he distrusts Crack. He finds his intimacy with Kerrigan ripening, and makes a little progress with Barry. Through a misunderstanding, at a stopping place, Hal is directed to Barry's room, instead of his own, and they exchange kisses. Next day he tells her he loves her. She answers that she mustn't love him, without giving any reason. Crack brutally insults Kerrigan. Hal forces him to apologize abjectly, and his feeling of enmity and disgust toward Crack is intensified. Barry promises Hal that next day she will reveal the shadow of despair that hangs over her. She tells him that, at her father's urging, she had married a man many years older than she, and had promised her father, on his deathbed, to stick to her husband, "no matter what happened," for ten years. That was four years ago, and despite her knowledge of her husband's unworthiness, she is adamant in her determination to keep her promise, though acknowledging her love for Hal.

"Hadn't really planned to get stuck anywhere," said Hal.

Crack flushed a very little, but his lazy eyes still smiled as he bounced the ball again. Then the others came, and Hal tried to rout the discomfort under his skin by a look at Barry's fresh, unconscious bravery of carriage. She was there, and real: the slick of gold under her hat, the color touched to her smooth cheeks, the clear, young texture of her throat in the white-framed opening. It was impossible to conceive of her—of that man; yet under the habitual perceptions and responses that still commanded Hal's behavior, it was impossible not to try to conceive of him.

They were in Rawlins for a late lunch, with a sort of awed fatigue upon them all at the thought of having covered three hundred and fifty miles since getting up. Mrs. Pulsipher's one contribution before sustenance arrived surprised Hal a good deal: she looked at him severely, almost unfriendly, and said, "You're a fine driver, Mr. Ireland."

Then there was food, and Mrs. Pulsipher was very busy.

"When do you think we might come to Los Angeles?" Sister Anastasia asked Hal; she looked down shyly, sorry to have put so bothersome a question. "Per'aps you cannot say. But there is some one waiting for me in Santa Barbara; and if you could per'aps tell me when we would possibly be there, it would not be bad to telegraph from 'ere—even if we did not come there in time."

Hal borrowed Kerrigan's pocket map and took out his pencil to measure.

"Look," he said, showing her: "if you don't mind traveling hard"—her limpid, gentle eyes deplored the implication that she was the only one to be considered—"we can be in Evanston—there—tonight. Salt Lake City is perhaps a little far. Then tomorrow night we can be in Las Vegas, and the distance from there to Los Angeles is less than what we have done this morning. So day after tomorrow, I should think, the bon Dieu willing." Day after tomorrow: and Barry had said, Los Angeles will end everything. It wasn't true; there was no end.

"Do you think I should telegraph?" she said, and under her modest acquiescence, Hal could see the unpleading trouble.

With a grace that would not have come if he had calculated it, he put his hand over hers on the table. "Sister, telegraph that," he said, smiling tender assurance, "and we will get there."

Her eyes thanked him again, and wished they could show him something that would help him too.

After lunch she went to telegraph, Kerrigan with her, and the Pulsiphers disappeared in search of souvenirs and popcorn. Crack sat on the runningboard of the car, his narrow body basking in the sunlight as his eyes did in their own pleasant thoughts. When Barry came from seeing to Dr. Caligari's lunch, Hal went to her and said, "Ride with me this afternoon."

"I think I'd better not," she said thoughtfully.

"I'll be good—I swear I'll be good," said Hal.

She looked at him in quick remorse. "Darling, I didn't mean that. It's Sister Anastasia. She's worried now, poor dear thing. She dreamt about her brother. Sometimes she held my hand this morning. If that helps, I'd like to be with her."

He tried not to look disappointed—smiled and leaned over to push his fist against Doctor Caligari's muzzle, wet and cool from a drink, but already panting again. "Right," he said. "I know. I hope to God we get there before her brother dies."

"Hal," she said, and he straightened up, "I've got to cheat, once." She looked down wonderingly at his mouth, then back at his eyes, and her quick whisper said, "I love you."

She went toward the door of the car, and Crack lounged up to open it. "Don't like the sunlight?" he said, but she got in without appearing to have heard him, her attention all for Doc's mistrust of Crack's courtesy. Crack shut the door and sat down again, speculating drowsily on Hal. "Like the sunlight," he said. "Like the way it bites on your skin, through your clothes."

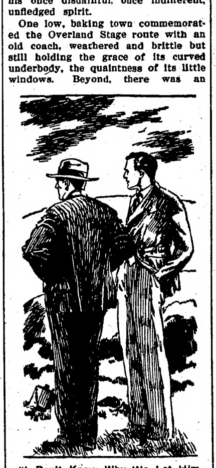
Barry's whisper repeated itself, quickly, softly, over and over in Hal's running blood. Think of nothing but that, you fool—nothing but that and the power, the omnipotence that rushes in it: there's nothing will stand against you—nothing will dare haunt you. Then he heard the echo of Crack's slow words and focused his look. "Mm," he said in absent flatness, "so do I."

"Moonlight," said Crack, his shy smile spreading a little, "doesn't bite on your skin, but it's nice." He kept looking at Hal as if he expected him to say something. "There'd ought to be a good moon tonight."

"Ought?" said Hal. He leaned over to unclip the hood and look at the oil gauge, the private waiting of Crack's blue eyes out of his vision, but only partly dismissed.

For more than an hour, Hal and Kerrigan didn't speak beyond monosyllables; yet it was as if the deepening of their sympathy had become tangible within the huge encompassment of this country—vast sweeps of sun-baked space under the sky, gigantic features definitely cleft from the petrified rafters of the world itself, sharp aspects balanced in unbreathing clearness—so very graduallly shifted by the mortal hurry of the car. When Kerrigan grunted, or Hal murmured some single exclamation to himself, it was acknowledgment of what they not only watched, but felt, interpreted together. Somehow the awe of profligate natural grandeur and the tonic of single human understanding were akin for Hal—not in their silent speech, but in their teaching to his unfledged spirit, his once disdainful, once indifferent, unfledged spirit.

One low, baking town commemorated the Overland Stage route with an old coach, weathered and brittle but still holding the grace of its curved underbody, the quaintness of its little windows. Beyond, there was an emergency landing field—red-and-white striped hut, beacon, and boundaries, arbitrarily fresh and trim in the middle of infinite emptiness. And a littered roadside stand or two offered incongruous memorial to another brave tradition in the name, "Pony Express Bar-B-Q."



"I Don't Know Why We Let Him Do It."

Somewhere beyond the bare, dry, sage-tufted basin of the Divide, they came on road construction, the surface leaving no doubt that it was necessary. For five miles they bumped slowly on into harder going—so slowly at last that the magpies at a dead coyote, limply huddled against some white thistle poppies beside the road, didn't start up until the car bounced out of a hole abreast of them. "D—n, this is awful," said Hal. Kerrigan said, "Stop at that car up there, and I'll ask the fella what they've got that's better."

The fella said there were eight more miles of this, and after that a good deal more, but there was a sideroad half a mile west there, and if you turned south on that and kept bearing west you couldn't lose the way and you'd come into the route again after the worst was over. So they turned off in half a mile, lumbered across a rocky ditch that scraped Rasputin's undersides: but there was the dusty tracks of other cars ahead and the going was much better. Then Hal drove smartly around a twist onto an outcrop of jagged rock in the middle of the road: there was a bump, a crack, and a ripping sound underneath, and with a lifeless sigh Rasputin rolled to a sedate, silent stop.

"Waterloo! Waterloo! Waterloo! Morne plaine!" said Kerrigan. "Here's a sitchation."

"What's the matter?" Pulsipher asked, leaning forward.

"I think there may be something wrong with the car," said Kerrigan.

"Oh," said John.

As Hal got out, he said to Kerrigan, "How far d'you make it we've come from the highway?"

"'Bout five miles," said Kerrigan. "But it didn't look like the Pennsylvania station there either, as I recall."

"No," said Hal glumly. He squatted down in the road to look under the car and saw a jagged plate of tin hanging ominously, under the front seat. "Lord!" he murmured and straightened to look back along the road. There lay the battery, in two pieces, near the torn remains of the tin box that had held it up. He walked back to it: it was efficiently wrecked, the bitter water already drunk down by the ground and the plates stuck over with grit. Hal nudged a piece of tin with his toe when Kerrigan and Crack came up, saying: "Look at the flimsy thing. Should've noticed that in Detroit, I s'pose. D—n it all anyway."

"It's a wonder we're alive," said Kerrigan, dropping the dead cigarette end from his lips as he raised a fresh one. "So what?"

"You hold the fort here; I'll go back to the highway and get a lift into a town and come out with another battery as soon as I can get it."

Crack made a sudden little sound, his eyes stirred by uncertain hope, and he said, "I'll go. Let me go."

Hal looked at him quickly, for a hint of his motive. That it was not merely to be of service he felt certain; yet Crack couldn't be afraid to stay out here. The drowsing eyes, smiling to themselves, weren't concerned with fear—seemed only to consider a lazy amusement in going on the errand. Hal was about to give his offer curt dismissal when Kerrigan said, "Sure, let him go."

An authority in Kerrigan's voice subdued Hal's feeling he should do it himself, left him open to the thought of an hour or two with Barry, Crack and his covert knowledge, his indolent curiosity, removed. They had the fella's bag and his fare; and. . . .

"All right," said Hal, "if you won't start telegraphing and waiting for answers again. Now, look." He made notes of what he wanted on the back of an envelope of Kerrigan's, explaining each item carefully to Crack. "Got money?" He slapped his pocket so that the heavy collection of silver dollars chinked.

Crack smiled as if Hal's care amused him, and he said, "Yeah—more'n fifty dollars."

"Right," said Hal. "Keep track of what you spend; and make it fast as you can."

"Sure," said Crack amiably. He seemed for a moment to speculate on what Hal might be thinking of him. Then, moderately embarrassed, he said, "Well—so long"; and he started back along the dusty road, his narrow, graceless figure incongruous and small against the enormous panorama beyond him.

After a silent moment of watching him, Hal said in rueful quiet, "I don't know why we let him do it."

"He'll be all right," said Kerrigan. "Can't say I love him like a brother, but he'll be all right."

"Why, d—n him," said Hal suddenly, "it was this morning—in Cheyenne—he asked if everything was all right so that we wouldn't get stuck."

"He's a right queer little man," said Kerrigan, still curiously watching him go. "Ever notice the tops of his ears?"

"What is it that's odd about his ears?" said Hal, half turning back to the car, then glancing round again.

"They look as if they were trying to come to a point," said Kerrigan. "I've seen only two or three pairs like 'em. And always on secret little men."

Mrs. Pulsipher sat there, neither grim nor martyred, but as if nervously on the lookout for a chance of placating some one. Hal smiled in at Sister Anastasia and told her, "We'll still be there day after tomorrow;" but it seemed like a reckless statement. The nun's modest eyes showed him thanks and belief: her hand moved up from where, beside her, it had been in Barry's. And Barry's look at him was one of tender confederacy in sparing Sister Anastasia her reticent concern. Then Hal explained the situation briefly and sat down on the running board to smoke a cigarette.

All around here was space and stillness, with the dry radiance of the lowering sun hot upon it. As far as you could see, nothing stirred; for miles and miles away nothing made a sound.

"What's it liable to do out here at night?" said Hal. "Rain? Get cold?"

"Might get a little cooler," said Kerrigan, "but 'twon't rain. Be a fine night."

"We seem to be assuming we'll be here into the night," said Hal. "How about bears and tigers?"

"Not many," said Kerrigan. Hal looked at him and found his heavy face grave and respectful.

"What's up?"

"I'm sorry you've got things on your mind," Kerrigan said quietly.

Hal took a long breath and smiled at him. "I s'pose that's one thing a mind's for," he said. Then: "I sort of thought I wasn't keeping it from you. And that helps, too. Colonel, I want to ask you about something later—later, when—if you'll let me."

Kerrigan's heavy, somehow graceful hand patted Hal's leg; he glanced off at the layered rampart of rock beyond the tiny railroad line, then down between his knees. "You keep after her," he said. "She's worth plenty. And if you want to talk, here I am."

The door on the other side of the car slammed and Barry, with Doc eagerly beside her, came round to them, watching them as if they were a pair of amusing children when they rose before her.

NEW YORK'S FAIR

By FIORELLO H. LA GUARDIA
Mayor of New York.

THERE is need of something to start things going, and the suggestion of a world's fair in New York city serves that purpose entirely. It is bound to have beneficial effects on business, on real estate and the morale of the entire city. It is something to hope for. It is something to keep us going for the next four years. And that is why I so readily endorsed the idea.

Now four years may seem a long time to some, but it is a very short time to prepare for an undertaking of the magnitude that is being planned. Don't forget that New York city cannot get away with a second-rate world's fair; it cannot be a world's fair which is just as good as any other city has ever had. It must be something so impressive, so much greater, so much more perfect than any other world's fair has ever been to be a success if it is held in New York city. There is so much more expected of us than there is from any other city.

NAZI TREATMENT OF JEWS

By HERBERT H. LEHMAN
Governor of New York.

IN PEACE they contributed to Germany's well-being; in war they laid down their lives for Germany's greatness. Suddenly, almost without warning, by official and national edict, all the Jews of Germany—600,000 people—were singled out for destruction, economically, socially and politically. They have been harried and driven out of their positions in business, in public life, in industry and in commerce and in the professions.

There has been no secrecy, no equivocation on the part of the German government. Hundreds of thousands of men and women in all walks of life have been ruthlessly and without pity deprived of their means of livelihood and of the primary rights of citizenship. Even the right to education is now being denied the Jewish children and youths, regardless of their intellectual qualifications.

ARMY MANEUVERS

By MAJ. GEN. FOX CONNER
United States Army.

IN MATTERS of organizations and equipment you have to take into consideration the national economy, and yet we have to get telephone communications going. The message centers are so busy at times that it takes an act of congress to get a message through. I think we have gone wild on the subject of radio. There are many instances in the last few days where interference garbled the messages. We are spending a great deal of work and money on radio. We ought to cut it out and spend it in developing our telephones.

The maneuvers have given no information whatever on the tactical value of mechanization and motorization. It has been shown that everything back of a division should be motorized. Beyond that I am not so sure. I don't see how in actual warfare you can make prompt, efficient reconnoissance from a station wagon.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS

By NEWTON D. BAKER
President Wilson's Secretary of War.

I BELIEVE we should go into the League of Nations. In the last six months the League has centered the attention of intelligent mankind and civilization on a problem more important than ever before in the history of the world.

In the old days, wars were started overnight for unknown causes. Here for the first time in human history a controversy has been laid on the table; reasons have been published so that you and I know what they are. That is an immeasurable advance.

It has made it possible for the common man in the street to read and judge the righteousness of the cause.

ETHIOPIANS AT UALUAL

By GEN. ERIC VIRGIN
Selassie's Swedish Military Adviser.

DID the Italians make use of modern artillery and equipment at the engagement at Ualual? They made use both of airplanes and tanks, and the fact that apart from the tanks three airmen could hover above the foremost fighting lines just as the action started must seem rather puzzling to those Italians who want to make out it was a question of a sudden attack.

It was found then that the Ethiopians did not run away in terror at the sight of airplanes, although these men had never seen flying machines and were believed to be terrified from the first moment. Instead, they charged straight at the Italian tanks, climbed on them at full speed and shot the crews inside.

Gold Is Pouring In

Washington.—It may be, and possibly is, true that the bulk of our people pay little attention to the fact that gold is pouring into the United States in an unprecedented volume. I can understand how the wheat farmer of the plains country or the cotton farmer of the South or any other type of farmer can fail to become excited over the influx of gold in the last five or six months. It appears to be a far cry from the grain fields or the cotton fields or the quarries or the small town to the heavy concentration of yellow metal to which the United States has been subjected. But the link nevertheless exists. It exists as surely and as definitely as night follows day and, therefore, it becomes a subject in which all of us are vitally interested.

Since the beginning of September a widespread flight of capital from Europe has manifested itself in the shape of gold exports to the United States. Three or four hundred millions of dollars in gold have landed here in that time. They bring the net inflow of gold for the year well above $1,000,000,000. And, going a bit further, this addition plus another $1,000,000,000 places our gold stocks in excess of $9,400,000,000, or roughly $2,000,000,000 more than was held here when the dollar was devalued under President Roosevelt's instructions.

It seems impossible to attribute this heavy and prolonged inflow to any single cause. Immediately after devaluation of the dollar, there was a steady stream of yellow metal headed for the United States which was due almost entirely to a desire of American holders of gold, temporarily stored abroad, to repatriate. But even in that case, there was a contributory factor to be considered. Monetary manipulation by the American government had a temporary effect on our exports, increasing them to some extent and it was increasing the balance of payments due to this country. So, we find our policies—that is, policies of the Roosevelt administration—responsible for the start of the inflow.

Later, another influence developed. Under the pressure of American monetary policies, foreign powers found their allegiance to the gold standard severely strained. Silver purchases by the treasury had an effect. The combination was primarily responsible for the second rush of gold.

Subsequently, the Italian-Ethiopian controversy began to take serious form and a new flood of gold to America developed. This was different than that which had immediately preceded it because this movement was related to international conditions of a political nature whereas the previous movement had resulted without relation to international strife in a military way but centered wholly upon American monetary policies and their effect upon economic conditions abroad.

* * *

What Can Happen

Now, let us consider what can happen. Those acquainted with finance recognize in the existence of a gigantic stock of gold—the largest in American history and approximately 45 per cent of the entire world stock—the existence of a potential, if indeed it is not a probable, base for inflation. There is so much gold held by the American government, which holds virtually all of the gold stocks in this country, that no end of paper money can be issued against it. Those who believe in that type of currency policies say that it would be perfectly safe; that the government could pay off dollar for dollar or even more than a dollar for every paper dollar outstanding from the gold it holds. This school of thought contends that there is actually a shortage of money in circulation and insists that this is one reason why the country has not recovered from the depression more rapidly than conditions show. Of course, a cold appraisal of that argument catalogues it as the same old demand for inflation of the currency and everyone knows what inflation will do in the way of wrecking the person who works for wages or whose sole income consists of a compensation delivered to him in the form of weekly, semimonthly, or monthly pay checks. The size of that check never has and never will catch up with the increase in prices which that individual must pay to live.

Then, there is another potential danger in this tremendous horde of gold. It is in many ways similar to that which I have just related. It is, however, more of a psychological condition than the first. I refer to the attitude usually adopted by those who pull for inflation when they see a government possessed of vast stores of precious metals.

* * *

'We Want More Money'

In this instance, the tangent of inflationist sentiment is joined with the sponsors of the silver buying program. They see all of this gold and silver and they simply cannot resist the opportunity for continued howling. Their speeches and their conversations are almost like a college yell: "We want more money," the more money which they desire being nothing more nor less than currency run off in the printing presses of the great bureau of engraving and printing in Washington.

Whether it is the first or the second type of inflation that is demanded, whether it is the printing press money or the money issued against gold as security, the results are the same. It is to be remembered in this connection that none of us can obtain gold from the treasury. The Roosevelt administration demanded of and obtained from congress legislation which definitely prohibited payment of gold for monetary use by the treasury under any circumstances except for the settlement of balances owed foreign nations. But that fact has not deterred demands by inflationists. They are calling and will continue to call for more paper money, and with every call the prices you pay for commodities are bound to increase—that is, they will increase until or unless there is a release of gold again for circulation as money.

So, it is quite apparent that as long as this influx of gold continues and as long as other nations are harassed by monetary manipulation in the United States, we are continually threatened with a "business boom" which is nothing less than inflation of credit. The real danger confronting this country, then, lies in that direction. Summarized, the threat is this: if that inflationist "business boom" gets started, no power on earth is able or will be able to stop it. The next and final step after that is complete destruction of our currency, and medium of exchange.

Stirred by Hoover

Political developments in the last few weeks have been completely dominated by the splurge of activity on the part of former President Herbert Hoover. His pot shots at the New Deal in several speeches have agitated the Democrats much more than they are willing to admit and, notwithstanding assertions of satisfaction, they have thrown a new fear into the laps of the Roosevelt New Dealers.

But, if the Hoover speeches have excited the New Dealers and the conservative Democrats, they have almost precipitated a riot among the Republicans of whom he must be said to be, at least, the titular leader. The bulk of the Republicans look upon Mr. Hoover, because of these recent speeches, as a potential Republican nominee for the Presidency against Mr. Roosevelt next year. They look upon him, further, as an individual who is likely to disrupt plans that contemplate reconciliation, a love feast, among the various factions of the Republican party. They have been struggling to lay a base for this love feast and because of the intense hatred that some of their number have for Mr. Hoover, his activity has opened this breach again, made it a blood-red wound.

Political observers and commentators have shown all manner of excitement because Mr. Hoover has made no statement whether he will or will not be a candidate for the Republican nomination. In plain words, they have been trying valiantly to conduct a campaign that will smoke out Mr. Hoover and make him say whether he is or is not a candidate.

All of the efforts to find out what Mr. Hoover proposes to do have failed and will continue to fail, even with the underground work of the New Deal, to bring from him a statement as to his purposes. He will announce them in his own good time and his statement will be definite when it is made.

Personally, from all of the information I have been able to assemble, I do not believe that Mr. Hoover has any intention of seeking the nomination. I am convinced his purpose is directed wholly and completely to one end: he fears the New Deal and he is trying with all of the power that he possesses to acquaint the country with his views which are obviously in opposition to the theories and policies and experiments of the New Deal. From sources which I consider to be faithful, because they always have been accurate heretofore, it is apparent to me that Mr. Hoover desires to lend his help in acquainting the country with the things in the New Deal which he regards as dangerous to our nation's well being and that beyond such a purpose he is content to enjoy life as a fisherman and vacationist.

But there is another phase of this situation which seems to me to warrant consideration. While some of the anti-Hooverites have been denouncing him, even calling him names under their breath, Mr. Hoover has done the Republican party a big favor. By his attacks on the New Deal; by his condemnation of the things in it which he regards as certain to be destructive; in short, by his activity which many construe as a campaign for the nomination, he has made the Republicans conscious of the job they have to do. He has awakened them and has put fight into them which three or four short months ago did not exist.

Choicest Products Sent Afield, Travelers Find

If one must have the choicest caviar, stay away from Russia, or if the finest cheese is desired, avoid Switzerland, reports the Columbus Dispatch. This statement only reflects what experienced travelers have discovered, for it is an axiom that the finest products of a district or country usually are reserved for export. Even in southern California one looks in vain in the grocery stores for the great sound oranges so common elsewhere.

Moscow serves the inferior caviar, with the eggs small and many of them broken, while search for a cheese of the large-holed variety in Lucerne brings the answer from the shopkeeper that the good cheeses are shipped to England or America. The answer to all this is very simple. Shipment to other parts brings higher prices.

Apparently the people are not concerned over the fact that these fine qualities of their choicest products are sent afield. Familiarity with their qualities lessens the appetite for the delicacies, and the increased revenue is sufficient to make up for any denial on their part.

Take Great Precautions With Diamond Workers

Before workmen are engaged in the De Beers mines at Kimberley they must sign a contract for four months, which can be prolonged. During this period the workers are prohibited from leaving the mining district and must live in compounds without their wives. When the wives visit them, conversation may take place only behind wire gratings. Native shops on the compound supply all necessities. At the expiration of the contracts, the workers are kept until a thorough examination has been made. Kept in cells for four days, their hair is shaved and many other precautions taken.

Tenacity

The first lesson the success candidate should learn is that of "keeping on, and keeping on and keeping on." Without this tenacity of purpose, education, brilliancy, even genius, will not amount to much. With it many a one-talent man has been more successful than ten-talent men without it.

False perceptions are responsible for many accidents. Stastistics show that a large percent of railway crossing accidents occur when drivers actually run into trains. This may be due to illusions of various sorts.

Some people also do not have distance perception. What seems to them to be several hundred yards away is probably only a few blocks away and traveling at the rate of 50 or 60 miles an hour does not allow time enough to make decisions.

Where people are involved in this type of accident, examination of eyes is advisable. It is sometimes difficult to tell whether or not people actually have good eyesight until examinations are made.

Some of the largest trucking concerns are now making this a provision so that they can protect motorists on the highway and also their own drivers and cargoes.

It is important for the physical condition of the driver to be in first class shape as it is to have the physical condition of the truck in order.

4-H Club Day Was Big Event At Warren Saturday, Oct. 26

Rural youth of Marshall county took first position in Warren on Saturday, October 26 as the Marshall County 4-H clubs conconducted their annual Fall Achievement Day at the county fair grounds when 16 farm boys and girls with their projects won trips to the Junior Livestock Show in the county competition.

The spacious Livestock pavilion at the county fair grounds was well filled with interesting exhibits entered by the boy or girl club members, there being 87 entries recorded. The 87 exhibitors included only the best in the county, as local Achievement days eliminated many would be entries, said Mr. R. A. Reierson, county agent and supervisor of the Achievement day. There were no home economics projects entered in the competition.

Exhibitors representing all the clubs in the county had prepared entries to be judged. The exhibits were above average and should rank fairly high in the state competition at the Junior stock show in South St. Paul, next week.

Winners of trips include the following:

Baby Beeves—Evelyn Jadeke, McCrea; Clifford Larson, Holt; Lloyd Larson, Holt; Martha Jadeke, McCrea; Martin Larson, Holt; Melvin Larson, Holt; James Monroe, Radium, and Fay Monroe, McCrea.

County Nurse Carries On Extensive Work for Public Health in County

Few people realize the work that is carried on in Marshall County by an unassuming young lady who is seen annually in every rural school and in a great number of our homes. She is the County Nurse. Since the county is not in a position to support this work, her salary is paid by the Red Cross and the sale of Christmas seals. During the last school year, this nurse examined around four thousand children of our public schools. She vaccinated against small pox and immunized against diphteria, approximately 1200 students. As a result of the examinations, over four hundred children have received medical care, correcting their various ailments. But her work is not limited to the schools alone. She visited 435 homes in the county in need of medical attention, and of these 30 were to pre-natal or new born cases. She was a tremendous factor in checking the contagions that swept over the County during December, January and February. And so in the home and in the schools, she travels thousands of miles in the interest of our greatest asset, namely public health.

Beginning the 11th of November, Armistice Day, the people of Marshall county will be given the privilege of contributing to this cause, through the annual Red Cross Roll Call. The following constitute the chairman for the solicitation in the various sections of the county: Mrs. W. Ready, Alvarado; Mrs. Geo. Wiltrout, Oslo; Mrs. Algot Anderson, Argyle; Dr. E. O. Nimlos, Stephen, Miss Hilda Ness, Miss Katherine Sounds, Radium; Miss Solveig Samuelson Rev. Harlan Peterson, Viking; Mr. Clarence Doran, Miss Ruth Peterson, Grygla; Miss Violet Anderson, Gatzke; Mrs. Emil Peterson, Middle River; Mr. Holgi, Strandquist; Mrs. Roy Sorum Holt; and Mrs. H. J. Haugen, Newfolden. These with their committees and the teachers of the rural schools will wait upon the people of Marshall County for the support of this worthy project.

The National Roll Call extends from Armistice day to Thanksgiving. But the Marshall county chapter is seeking to complete the work by November 16. You can be assured that your support will be for a worthy cause.

The Safety Man

Home safety is just as important as highway safety.

Cleaning at home with gasoline, benzine, naphtha, or other flammable fluids, is extremely hszardous. Many persons have been either burned to death or horribly disfigured, and homes burned down or wrecked by explosions from the vapors of flamable cleaning fluids.

It takes very little flamable vapor when mixed with air to cause an explosion when using flamable liquids. Silks, such as silk clothes or hose, when rubbed against silk causes a spark of static electricity which may ignite the vapors of flamable liquids and cause explosion. This is true also of leather gloves and other materials. Any small flame or spark is enough to cause an explosion that can wreck a building.

Don't use inflammable liquids for cleaning pursoses.

There are enough non-flamable liquids and preparations for cleaning on the market now, so that no one needs to use a flammable liquid for any cleaning in the home.

The Weather

Last Thursday morning it began to snow here and we were so sure that it was not going to amount to anything that we forgot about mentioning it in the last issue. However, since then we have had a little more added to what we got then and the weather has been fair to middling. Wednesday was a nice day and we are still in hopes of seeing this snow go away again this fall.

SYNOPSIS

Following his father's criticism of his idle life, and withdrawal of financial assistance, Hal Ireland, son of a wealthy banker, is practically without funds but with the promise of a situation in San Francisco, which he must reach, from New York. He takes passage with a cross-country auto party on a "share expense" basis. Other members of the party include an attractive girl, Barry Trafford; middle-aged Giles Kerrigan; Sister Anastasia, a nun; and an individual whom he instinctively dislikes, Martin Crack. Barry's reticence annoys him. To Kerrigan he takes at once, but he distrusts Crack. He finds his intimacy with Kerrigan ripening, and makes a little progress with Barry. Through a misunderstanding, at a stopping place, Hal is directed to Barry's room, instead of his own, and they exchange kisses. Next day he tells her he loves her. She answers that she mustn't love him, without giving any reason. Crack brutally insults Kerrigan. Hal forces him to apologize abjectly, and his feeling of disgust toward Crack is intensified. On his insistence, Barry tells Hal that, at her father's urging, she had married a man many years older than she, and had promised her father, on his deathbed, to stick to her husband, "no matter what happened," for ten years. That was four years ago, and despite her knowledge of her husband's unworthiness, she is determined to keep her promise, though admitting her love for Hal.

"Come on," she said. 'Let's stretch our legs. Let's see Wyoming."

"Lady, have you ever had a good look at my legs?" Kerrigan asked, as a question of grave scholarship. "No, of course not; I beg pardon. The point is they're past stretching. Take my young friend Ireland with you, but let me have him back in good condition. And mind your pup: coyotes'll lead a dog till he's tired and then turn on him."

"I wish you'd come," said Barry.

"I wish I would," said Kerrigan, "but I won't. I'll sit here thinking of old, old brandy, and I'll be younger when you come back. Be off. If you run into Hostyles, send me a line by one of 'em and I'll be at your side in a twinkling—say, an hour and a half."

At the top of a little ridge to the westward, from which they could look down the road where Rasputin waited, and see across to the mountain range behind which the sun would set, they slowed their pace and stopped.

"That's not a long walk," said Barry.

"Long enough," said Hal. "Rattlesnakes."

"Oh gosh! not really?" said Barry, moving to him.

He watched her without stirring his arms, smiling a little at her and to himself. "No," he said. "I just wanted you to come where I could touch you and then show you I wouldn't. I'm proud of keeping my promise; you must ask me why I'm so strong."

There was a memory of solemn alarm under her smile. "Why are you?" she said dutifully. She sat down facing the west, her legs doubled and one firm shoulder hunched where she leaned against her arm.

"Because," he said, stretching himself before her, "because you've drawn your loveliness up into a kind of royalty that makes you more beautiful than I thought even you could be. Because you have a pride and purity in your eyes that goes as far above the world as that peace that makes Sister Anastasia beautiful. And yet your bravery is warm and living; you don't turn your back on life; and you can't turn your back on the most implacable thing I've known in life—my fantastic desires for you, for the beauty behind your eyes, for the beauty—"

She turned from her lonely looking into the west, glanced from his mouth to his eyes with that awed, still consternation, and said, "Hal, that's not—darling, we'll have to go back."

"And because," Hal went on, "tomorrow nothing you can put against me can stop me—nothing. There, I've finished. And you can watch the strength and implacability coming into me with every minute of my promise."

"Hal," she said hopelessly, stripping her hat from the golden luxuriance that ran simply back from the round of her forehead. She faced the west again and watched it, trying its farthest distance with the sorrow of her eyes. Then she turned to him and said artlessly, "What about your socks?"

"Socks?" said Hal, his look laughing as he glanced at them. "What about them?"

"I've got things to wash out—tonight, or whenever we get anywhere," she said. "If you've got any things, I can do them, too."

"You're certainly not going to wash my socks," said Hal.

She seemed to straighten a little in defense as she said, "And why not?"

"Why, d—n it all, because—"

"If you were ill," Barry interrupted, "would you let anybody else take care of you if I could? I wouldn't shine your shoes, because you're plenty strong enough to do it for yourself; but for the love of Mike why shouldn't I do washing for you if you've got things that need it? Is it beneath me, or something? Wouldn't you shine my shoes if I asked you to?"

"Of course."

"Well, then. Perhaps you didn't know you wear woolen socks, and woolen socks shrink if they're not carefully done."

"I didn't know that," said Hal. "Tell me more."

"I'd tell you lots more," said Barry, "if you'd try to see my meaning, and remember it."

"Barry, d'you think I forget anything you say—anything, even the first word you said to me, years ago, when you used to make me mad?"

"Well, what did I say to you first?" said Barry, challenge cheering her eyes.

"You said—We were standing in that place, wherever it was—you know—that place, and you said—No, signals off. We were in the car and you said it wasn't my cigarette that burned your coat."

Barry chuckled at him, slowly and huskily, with her head a little back and her firm, white throat full. "Close, Mr. Ireland, close. I'm glad you remembered. I used to watch you being made mad by me and love it. And now—" she said, her voice touching the edge of sorrow, then evading it in a little sigh: "now I'm asking you to let me wash your socks."

* * * * * * *

The sun set in bold, steady red, a short ledge of cloud fastened across it; and the whole dry spread of the land—the tawny, tufted sweep of plain ground, the rust and gray and emery stripes of strata under the flat terraces of rock, the high, heavy mountain peaks piled beyond—all came by a soft, purple clarity, as if they stood in tinted water. Hal and Barry had risen to watch the silent glory of the colors—she with her back against him and her hands clasped over his, the slow rhythm of her breathing under his touch.

She took a faltering breath and let it go reluctantly; and Hal, his mouth near the faintly fragrant thicket of half-curls, whispered "What?"

She turned her head to look at his lips, then up at his eyes, her looking intimate, expectant; then she stood away from him and returned to the fading colors of the western sky. "Beauty—" she said; "beauty to last forever, in a few minutes."

He pressed her hand before he let it go, watching her. "I s'pose while we can find the way we'd better go back," he said. "Some day, we'll never have to go back."

She Gave Her Soft Laugh and Relaxed Against Hal.

With a limber bending of her body, she picked up her hat, and it swung between them in her hand as they started down.

It wasn't cool, but Kerrigan was arranging brush and a few desiccated fence posts for a fire when they came to the car.

"Hi there," he said comfortably, as if they had kept house together for a long time. "Got the sun put away all right?"

"Yes," said Hal. "Very prettily, too. What's the fire for? Goin' to have a blizzard?"

"No," said Kerrigan. "Just like to attract attention."

"Haven't seen any to attract," said Hal. "But you know your publicity out here better than I do."

There was a pleasant murmur of welcome as Barry got into the car where the others still waited. Hal, with a strange, assured feeling of peace upon him, looked up at the fi[illegible]clear-riding stars and breathed [illegible]ost slowly full.

"Lord, it's good," he said [illegible] Kerrigan. "You should've told me I'd like Wyoming."

With the star-scattered night complete and the fire going, they made a thin supper from Mrs. Pulsipher's oranges, the popcorn which she ordered John to uncache, and some agglomerated fruit-drops from a bag in Kerrigan's pocket. The atmosphere was subdued, quiet, the voices not quite tentative but variously respectful, as if some one were asleep nearby. And each time John, after a silence, wondered where that Mr. Crack was, Hal felt the peace upon his blood freshly—a peace assured of strength, of Barry's nearness, and of his final coming to her—after the term of his promise.

Those in the car got out to stretch and stroll briefly and look up into the night; and past ten, when John gave a yawn that echoed in the shameless cavern of his mouth, Mrs. Pulsipher suggested sleep. She and Sister Anastasia disposed themselves in the back seat, while John cramped his gaunt lankiness in the front and Barry, Hal, and Kerrigan sat along the running board, watching the fire and talking.

"Listen," said Barry suddenly, interrupting her own speech. Doc raised his head for a grunt, sniffing. "There comes somebody."

They listened. A coyote—the pale, pretty ghost of a guilty dog—passed on the edge of the gloom beyond the fire, and Barry's hand came to rest on Hal's knee.

"It is somebody," Kerrigan muttered in a moment, looking at his watch. "He's been long enough. It's eleven."

Impulsively Hal said, "It's not Crack," and wondered why he was so coolly sure.

Barry looked around at him slowly, solemnly. "How d'you know?" she said.

Hal moved a little inside his clothes. "Doesn't feel like him," he said. He gave a short, uneasy laugh of deprecation.

The footfalls—made by heavy, stiff-soled shoes—brought their slovenly beat nearer and stopped. Hal got up and walked around the car. A broad glow, as from a white and distant fire, was spread in the east where the moon would come, but he could see no one down the road. "Evening," he called into the dark.

"Evenin', evenin'," came a cracked voice after an interval. "You the folks got the fire? I seen it from a way back and come to see what was goin' on."

He clumped up to the fire—a tall, ratty man, no hat on his tangled hair, shirt dirtily open at his throat, blue-jeans cut off about three inches above the tops of his veteran cow-boots. His grinning lips were stained at the corners and his bright, empty, eyes watched the fire, not any of the three who were near it.

"You folks stranded, 'ey?" he said cheerily in a minute.

"Looks it," said Kerrigan.

"I run into some folks last year was stranded," he said. "Over t'other side. Seems like I'm always runnin' into folks that's stranded." He grinned happily at the fire.

"Didn't see a fella go out to the highway and get a lift into town, did you?" Hal said. "Late this afternoon?"

"To what town?" the man said absently.

"Any town," said Hal.

"No," said the man. "Last week I seen a feller get a lift out on the road. Goin' west, he was. But I mind these other folks was stranded there—over t'other side. I come on one of 'em drinkin' water out of a little crick we got. I says to him, 'How's it taste?' an' he says 'Good,' an' I says, 'That's good, I'm glad t'know an',' he says, 'Why?' an' I told him why." He laughed silently without looking at any of them.

"Why?" said Barry in calm interest.

"'Cause I found one o' my sheep lyin' drownded f'uther up the crick where he was drinkin', an' I wanted t'know how it tasted."

"Did you tell him that?" said Kerrigan.

"I told him," said the man. "He didn't like it."

"You're a sheepherder," said Kerrigan.

"I am," said the man, with a quick nod of pride. "Only I ain't jus' now. I been fired." He nodded again, his stained mouth open. "I live over t'other side there in the shed by the Old South Corral. An' when I feel like it some day, I'll tear it down."

"Why'll you tear it down?" said Kerrigan.

"It'll make 'em sore," said the man. "You can have anything you want up there. If you want to tear the shack down, I'll help you."

"That's mighty nice of you," said Kerrigan, "but I guess we'll just sit here for a while."

The man watched the fire a little longer. Then he turned and grinned at Kerrigan and said, "Well, I guess I'd oughta get back. Moon's comin' up."

"Well, good night to you," said Kerrigan.

"Good night," said the man, and abruptly started clumping away again.

The late moon floated up clear and brilliant to pale the stars with its gray-blue dusk, and they moved from the running board, nearer the fire, to watch that bright drifting.

"You're at liberty," Kerrigan said to Barry, "to lean against my friend Ireland and have a nap."

She gave her soft laugh and relaxed against Hal, as if she'd been waiting for Kerrigan's permission. Her hair touched his cheek as she settled her head to his shoulder; she looked up at him in sleepy comfort, saying: "Too heavy?" then pressed closer to him and closed her eyes. And in the naturalness of that, Hal was near believing he had dreamt the obstacles to their united fortune: her trapped allegiance to that man, that husband, was too grotesque a sacrilege.

The slow moon marked the moving of the night across the sky; and Hal and Kerrigan sat together in it, by Barry's sleeping—kept silences that were broken only by the soft settling sound of the fire, or murmured of things not so much satisfying in themselves as in the fact that they spoke of them here.

Every so often Hal looked down at Barry's face—her dark lashes laid in a little radiant fringe on each smooth cheek, her vital lips at rest together, her breathing gentle and oblivious of care. And once when Kerrigan happened to glance at him as he looked up, they smiled at each other as if she somehow belonged to both of them.

Russians Use Coal for Heat Without Ignition

Russian farmers have discovered a way to speed up the ripening of their cotton crops by a month or more. They use coal to warm the cotton plants without burning the coal. This seeming paradox is being performed at Kazakstan. Obtaining heat from coal without burning is the application of a simple fact of physics that dark colors absorb the heat in the sun's rays better than light colors.

The Zazakstan farmers simply spread coal dust lightly over their fields; about 100 pounds to an acre. The darkened surface of the land is a better absorber of heat during the day and reradiates more of it as warmth during the night. The higher average temperature of the land during the growing season, therefore, shortens the time necessary for the crop to mature by over a month.

Meaning of Kidnaping

Kidnaping has a broad meaning in criminal law and many who have committed this crime unknowingly have been sent to prison. In most states "intent" is not necessary and, secondly, the offense includes "keeping or detaining" anyone against his will. One odd case on record is that of a man who was convicted of kidnaping his wife because he forced her to accompany him on a journey.—Collier's Weekly.

Find Out

From Your Doctor if the "Pain" Remedy You Take Is Safe.

Don't Entrust Your Own or Your Family's Well-Being to Unknown Preparations

BEFORE you take any preparation you don't know all about, for the relief of headaches; or the pains of rheumatism, neuritis or neuralgia, ask your doctor what he thinks about it—in comparison with Genuine Bayer Aspirin.

We say this because, before the discovery of Bayer Aspirin, most so-called "pain" remedies were advised against by physicians as being bad for the stomach; or, often, for the heart. And the discovery of Bayer Aspirin largely changed medical practice.

Countless thousands of people who have taken Bayer Aspirin year in and out without ill effect, have proved that the medical findings about its safety were correct.

Remember this: Genuine Bayer Aspirin is rated among the fastest methods yet discovered for the relief of headaches and all common pains . . . and safe for the average person to take regularly.

You can get real Bayer Aspirin at any drug store—simply by never asking for it by the name "aspirin" alone, but always saying BAYER ASPIRIN when you buy.

DOCTORS KNOW

Mothers read this:

THREE STEPS TO RELIEVING CONSTIPATION

I II III

A cleansing dose today; a smaller quantity tomorrow; less each time, until bowels need no help at all.

Why do people come home from a hospital with bowels working like a well-regulated watch?

The answer is simple, and it's the answer to all your bowel worries if you will only realize it: many doctors and hospitals use liquid laxatives.

If you knew what a doctor knows, you would use only the liquid form. A liquid can always be taken in gradually reduced doses. Reduced dosage is the secret of any real relief from constipation.

Ask a doctor about this. Ask your druggist how very popular liquid laxatives have become. They give the right kind of help, and right amount of help. The liquid laxative generally used is Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. It contains senna and cascara — both natural laxatives that can form no habit, even in children. So, try Syrup Pepsin. You just take regulated doses till Nature restores regularity.

Rubbing the Eyes a Dangerous Practice

Mascara, eye shadow and brow pencil if judiciously applied spell glamor, but they're not the whole story when the eye question comes up—as it does every time you look in the mirror.

Eyes can be dusty, tired, weary and reddened. Then, no matter how delicately you frame your eyes, the picture is spoiled.

When the eyes feel and look all blurry, a few drops of lotion help to soothe and refresh them.

A lotion has no strengthening effect—go to a good oculist if you feel in need of that—but it does lessen the danger of eye infection because it removes irritating particles, and it's safe to use. Speaking of safety—if you're fond of your eyes, don't rub them. Rubbing your eyes is just the worst thing you can do to them and it leaves them an unbecoming red without giving any real relief at all. That's where a good lotion is somebody's gift to eye-conscious humanity.

NO ALKALIES FOR ACID INDIGESTION

MILLIONS have found they do not need to drench their stomachs with strong, caustic alkalies. Physicians have said this habit often brings further acid indigestion. So much more safe and sensible to simply carry a roll of Tums in your pocket. Munch 3 or 4 after meals—or whenever troubled by heartburn, gas, sour stomach. Try them when you feel the effects of last night's party, or when you smoke too much. Tums contain a wonderful antacid which neutralizes acid in the stomach, but never over-alkalizes stomach or blood. As pleasant to eat as candy and only 10c at any drug store.

Great Stone Blocks Are Island of Guam Mystery

The great blocks of stone which, by some unknown process, were hoisted in place to build the Egyptian pyramids have caused many to marvel, yet on the island of Guam there are stones larger than those used in the pyramids, evidently marking the burial place of an ancient native chief.

The huge stone blocks weigh approximately 2,500 pounds each, and when found one rested on the other. Both are of coral formation. The finding of many such burial places on Guam indicates that this island once had a big population. Little is known about its early inhabitants.

MILLIONS OF POUNDS HAVE BEEN USED BY OUR GOVERNMENT

WASHINGTON DIGEST

National Topics Interpreted

BY WILLIAM BRUCKART

NATIONAL PRESS BLDG. WASHINGTON, D.C.

The African War

Washington.—A friend of mine, a minor official of the government, remarked to me the other day that he could find very little cause for excitement in his own mind about the hostilities between Italy and Ethiopia. The fighting is so far away, he said, and the nations involved are of such comparative insignificance in the whole world structure that he found no reason at all to do more than read the black-faced headlines about the trouble as they appeared from day to day in the great metropolitan newspapers.

We were, at the time, wending a rather slow way around the golf links of the Congressional Country club. The course is set in the midst of fine farming country and my friend used the situation as a basis for his argument that there was little reason for any of us to take the Italian-Ethiopian trouble seriously.

"How can it make very much difference to us," he asked with a wave of his hand toward the fine farms and splendid homes within sight, "when we have a nation so admirably supplied with resources of which those are typical? We can live even if the trouble broadens. If necessary we can close our shores to foreigners and keep out of the trouble."

Unwittingly, my friend supplied a text. In fact, he supplied two of them.

The man in question is able, has a good brain and is doing his job satisfactorily, but it is his first connection with the government in an official capacity. He has not had training heretofore that fits him or equips him to deal with broad international questions. In time his views will change. Of that I have no doubt, but the fact remains that his attitude on the Italian-Ethiopian situation marks him as one of countless hundreds of government officials, past and present, who are brought in and given responsible posts without regard to their understanding of all of the problems which they must meet.

The other text which my friend's conversation suggested is "what interest do we have in the African war?"

Most individuals will agree that at the moment we are in no danger and that immediately there is no prospect of any kind of trouble insofar as the United States is concerned but it is not the immediate prospect that we must consider. It is not the immediate prospect that caused Secretary Hull of the State department to declare and to reiterate that the objective of present American policies is to keep this country out of war. That was the reason congress enacted the so-called neutrality resolution and that was the reason President Roosevelt placed an embargo against the shipment of arms and munitions of war to the present belligerents. Again, it is not the present, but where we go from here that concerns us.

* * *

Europe a Powder Keg

Undoubtedly congress did a popular thing when it adopted the resolution designed to prevent development of circumstances which may place us on the verge of the cataclysm. I say the action was popular because there has been no indication from any important quarter, except from traders whose business has been handicapped, against the official policy enacted in that resolution.

But the end is not yet. In the first instance, all of Europe is virtually a powder keg. Potential dynamite lies in the differences between Russians and Japanese. Their frontier can be the scene of the fated overt act at any moment. And, while the hope is for settlement of all differences between the Japanese and the Russians in a peaceful manner, there is no assurance that these can be so settled.

Since the Italian dictator, Mussolini, brazenly announced that he wanted more territory for his people and proposed to get it at the expense of the black men in Ethiopia, tension between Great Britain and Italy has increased from day to day. Backing and filling between the British and the French have been the regular order because the British and the French have comparable interests in Africa. Further, a strengthened Italy means a menace of a continuing character to her neighbor, France.

The British have scores of battle boats in the Mediterranean sea. Those ships are at anchor from which they can be called into quick use. The British say the fleet is maintained there merely as a "precaution." Mussolini knows better. He knows and every one else will discover after even a superficial examination of the situation that the British will brook no moves by Italy that threaten British control of the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan nor will the British permit Mussolini to gain control of such Ethiopian territory as will jeopardize their supervision over territory through which the waters of the blue Nile flow. These waters are essential to the British.

So it takes no stretch of the imagination to conclude that even a minor incident, accidental damage to a British boat or an injury to a British citizen—of such things and from such things comes war—will cause trouble.

If by any chance one of those "incidents" comes, the British and the Italians will be at each other's throats. Next, should that break develop, every nation in Europe is compelled for one reason or another to align itself with one side or the other. Hitler, for example, would want nothing better than an opportunity to stir up some trouble among the other nations in order that he could spread his power over Austria and Hungary and maybe over some of the Balkan states. He wants more territory and if a free-for-all should get started Herr Hitler will lose no time in subjugating some of the neighboring countries.

* * *

Would Hit Our Commerce

Even if these conditions obtain, my friend's statement that the war is a long way off still is correct. It would be three or four thousand miles from American shores but the point of difference is that we are a commercial nation and if the European powder keg explodes our commerce would be affected. Indeed, it would be virtually destroyed.

But, it will be asked, why not live within our own shell? The answer is, we cannot do so. Our ships, carrying the products of our farms and factories, would be plying the seas. Nations at war do not take the time always to learn the character of cargo aboard a ship at sea nor do they inquire its destination or the purpose for which it is to be used. Then, we hear of the overt act. An American ship with an American crew and an American cargo is sunk. Or, American-owned and manned business units in some one of the belligerent countries suffers from one of the various things that takes place during the war. It may be the act of some hot-headed foreign natonal or it may be a deliberate move by a government, but the die is cast. An American citizen is killed, an American flag is insulted. We are in it.

It seems to me, therefore, that we have every reason to watch closely those developments abroad. Our own people are not blameless for some of the conditions that develop. For instance, the following day after Mr. Roosevelt issued his proclamation prohibiting exports of arms and munitions and, by inference, prohibiting dealings of any kind with Italy and Ethiopia, New York exporters rose with a mighty howl and the Port Development Authority in New York protested. One group saw all opportunities for profitable business stricken out by the prohibition against exports and the other, with proper civic pride, complained that the executive action would wreck New York city as a maritime center. Their complaints were natural, quite human, but their refusal to accept the national policy simply represents one of the many things constituting an early step that may subsequently be one of the foundation stones of war.

I do not mean to say in these columns that we should become a peace-at-any-price nation. On the contrary, I think that is a cowardly position for any nation to take. What I do emphasize, however, is that if we are to have an international policy, we should adhere to it.

* * *

Neutrality Edict

Now, let us consider the governmental problem. I said earlier that congress undoubtedly had acted in accordance with the views of a majority of our people. President Roosevelt has chosen to accept the neutrality resolution as a mandate from congress which gives him almost no discretion. His arms embargo, his shipping prohibition and his warning to American citizens that if they travel on boats belonging to the belligerent powers they do so at their own risks was the narrowest construction possible to have been placed on the neutrality edict of congress.

Congress is not in session and will not be back here again until January. The President's hands are tied unless he decides to call congress into extra session and that, of course, will not be done unless sudden flames of war sweep over the whole world. Therefore, if Mr. Roosevelt clings to the policy which he has adopted in narrowly construing the neutrality resolution until the congressional session opens in January, congress can do no more than commend him for following its dictates. But if any of the conditions enumerated above should place the American neutrality position where a test must be had, congress must accept the blame. So, as long as Mr. Roosevelt follows his present course and throws himself completely on the law, the President can make short answer to those who would enlist this country in international action. That position, of course, has its weaknesses because something may develop overnight with which he cannot deal under an inflexible law but, on the other hand, the fact that he can do little without calling congress back, certainly provides a cooling-off period during which the thoughts of a nation may crystallize.

Not Nine, but 50,000 Planets, Says Scientist

The solar system, of which the earth is a part, probably contains not 9 but 50,000 planets, it has been estimated by Prof. Armin O. Leuschner, of the University of California. In addition to the well known ones, Mercury, Venus, Earth, Mars, Jupiter, Saturn, Uranus Neptune, and Pluto, a swarm of lesser objects have orbits around the sun, most of them in the region between Mars and Jupiter. Nearly 1,300 of the small bodies, or asteroids, have been located since the beginning of the last century, on the first night of which the Italian astronomer Guiseppe Piazzi sighted the first, Ceres.—Literary Digest.

R. C. CAMPAIGNS TO PREVENT ACCIDENTS

Program Inaugurated in Local Chapters to Cut Down Farm and Home Accidents

The American Red Cross has launched a nation-wide campaign to eliminate hazards in the home and on the farm that now take an annual toll of nearly 35,000 lives, according to a recent statement by James L. Fieser, vice chairman in charge of domestic operations.

"Every Red Cross chapter is being asked to play a part in this campaign," Mr. Fieser said. "Hazards in the various communities will be pointed out. The children in our schools throughout the country will be given a list of the home hazards and asked to enroll parents or relatives in the fight against them."

Nearly five million men, women, and children were temporarily disabled in the homes of America last year by accidents, officials of the National Safety Council have revealed. Most of the accidents in which persons were killed and injured could have been prevented, according to this safety agency, this fact alone largely motivating the Red Cross drive for accident elimination.

Active cooperation of social, civic, educational, veterans', and other groups has been secured. Red Cross inspection forms or home check lists will be distributed to homes where there are no children with the help of these organizations.

Due to inaccessibility and lack of compensation coverage, little or no pioneering has been done in the field of farm safety, the Red Cross states. However, more people were accidentally killed in agricultural pursuits last year than in any other occupation, making the need for safety education and farm home inspection apparent.

Other agencies now active in the accident-prevention field point to the fact that, because of its nearly 13,000 chapters and branches, the Red Cross has a unique opportunity to successfully promote a project of this nature.

Home accidents injure many more than do automobile accidents; they kill nearly as many, claiming an average of about 80 lives daily. In terms of dollars and cents, for the practical minded, home accidents cost more than $1,000 per minute.

Accidents of all types are Public Enemy No. 4. Only three diseases cause as many deaths each year, heart disease, cancer, and cerebral hemorrhage.

"The home is not the place of safety it is commonly supposed to be," said Mr. Fieser in commenting on the new Red Cross service to the community. "The Red Cross, as a part of its chartered obligation to prevent death and alleviate suffering, is conducting this humanitarian program to cut down the mounting toll of avoidable personal injury and death in the homes of the country."

The annual Red Cross roll call, running from Armistice Day to Thanksgiving Day, is one of the means of backing such a campaign. All citizens of the United States are offered the opportunity to join and assist in the work of the organization.

Red Cross Has Busy Year; Statistics Impressive; Services Varied

Figures gathered at random from the year's report of the American Red Cross reveal the magnitude of the work being carried on by that organization.

Red Cross workers assisted 54,305 veterans; 587 Red Cross Public Health nurses paid 921,455 visits to 186,326 patients; 98,441 first aid certificates were issued while 46,693 persons were trained in life saving. Volunteer workers produced 3,102,843 surgical dressings, with 80,901 volunteers being on active duty throughout the year.

First Aid Treatment Taught Thousands By Red Cross

More than 187,000 certificates showing completion of first aid courses were issued last year by the Red Cross. This shows a gain of 56,000 certificates over the previous year. Approximately 64,200 boys in C.C.C. camps throughout the country passed first aid tests. Since the Red Cross first entered the field of first aid teaching, being one of the first organizations in the world to do so, almost one million persons have been trained in handling emergency treatment.

The annual report of the Red Cross further reveals that more than 327,000 copies of the Red Cross Aid Handbook have been sold at home and abroad.

The Red Cross has assisted 54,305 veterans in clearing their cases through the U. S. Veterans' Bureau this past year.

Last year 3,837,941 persons became members of the Red Cross. The annual roll call takes place each year between Armistice Day and Thanksgiving Day.

Junior Red Cross members increased by 402,000 enrollments during the year which has just passed. Junior members carried on an exchange of correspondence with junior members in 62 other countries having Red Cross Societies.

You can't sleep on a "COT"

BUT who wants to sleep on an apricot? It's not that kind of cot. Save it for eating purposes. Canners call them "cots" for short, but that's because they are so busy canning them to meet the demand, that there's not much time to talk about them.

So if you want to know a little more about this fruit that tastes so good, here is a brief saga. Its three species are, it is believed, all native to Asia. During the time of Alexander the Great it was introduced into Europe and first cultivated in England during the sixteenth century. Today it is one of California's most important fruit crops.

Orchard Flavored Fruit

Fresh picked apricots are difficult to get in most localities, because the season commences about the middle of June and lasts only about eight weeks. Unless you go out to the orchards you are not likely to get the fruit at its best, because of the delicate texture which does not stand shipment well.

Canners, however, have made an intensive study of "cots", and their orchards produce only the prime fruit, which is picked and canned so quickly that the apricots which we know in cans are some of the very finest possible.

Housewives have found that their tart taste combines nicely with many fruits which are less distinctive in flavor. For this reason, "cots" are to be found in some of the best fruit cups, salads and desserts.

Do you know the new ways of making the most of this healthful fruit? The following suggestions have been chosen because of their summer slant and because they give a decorative appearance to your menus, as well as adding a new flavor. Serve them in your prettiest glassware or china—they rate it.

For Instance

Circe's Cup: Cut in halves the apricots from a No. 2 can, add the grapefruit pulp from a No. 2 can (or one and three-quarters cup of fresh grapefruit). Leave the grapefruit in fairly large pieces. Divide into glasses. Mix the juice of the apricots and the grapefruit with the juice from one lemon. Pour over. Chill very well, sprinkle liberally with finely minced mint and serve. This serves eight persons.

Apricot Custard: Beat four eggs slightly, add three tablespoons of sugar, one and one-half tablespoons flour and a few grains of salt. Add one and one-half cups of scalded milk and the apricots from a No. 2 can, pressing them through a sieve. Heat to boiling. Pour into individual custard cups, place in hot water and bake in a moderate oven—350 degrees—until firm, or about forty-five minutes. Serve cold from the cup. This serves eight persons.

Orange and Black Salad: Drain and chill apricots from a No. 2 can and one and one-half cups of orange sections. Place them attractively on lettuce hearts. Garnish with one-half cup of stoned dates which have been stuffed with cream cheese. Pour over French dressing with chopped fresh mint added. This serves eight persons.*

AAA Makes Plans To Buy 2,000 Carloads of Spuds

Following a request from Gov. Olson, the Agricultural Adjustment Administration is considering the purchase of 2,000 carloads of potatoes to be obtained direct from growers for distribution to families on relief, Chester D. Davis, AAA administrator, informed the Governor this week in a communication from Washington.

The purchase would be allocated to the major late surplus potato producing states, Mr. Davis announced.

The potato surplus purchase proposal is the outcome of a survey of the potato situation in Minnesota conducted by R. A. Trovatten, commissioner of agriculture, and assisted by E. M. Corneaby, director of the marketing division of the department, as ordered by the governor.

The state agricultural officials informed the governor that the potato market in Minnesota is glutted in the Red River Valley and the sandland district, which includes the area between Minneapols and Princeton. They asserted, however, that a recent frost has removed some of the surplus, but that warehouses and farmers' potato cellars and storage houses are loaded with potatoes.

In urging the AAA to buy Minnesota potatoes for relief purposes, the governor pointed out the necessity immediate action and offered to furnish the federal agency with a list of Minnesota potato growers, stressing that he hoped AAA would purchase the stock direct from the farmers, thereby eliminating the middlemen. Commission Trovatten has prepared such a list, the Governor said.

In addition to the consideration of purchasing potatoes for relief distribution, Administrator Davis announced a proposed plan under which the AAA believes that prices for the 1935 potato crop will be increased. This will consist of diverting surplus potatoes for the manufacture of potato flour, vinegar, starch, alcohol and feed. A public hearing on this plan was held in St. Paul on November 6 and 7, Mr. Davis stated.

The whole diversion program, however, is contingent upon a favorable decision by the Comptroller-General of the United States, who would have to arrange funds for the carrying out of the plan.

Kenneth Swan gave his neighbors and friends a little party at his farm home on Wednesday evening.

When several hundred families were sent to Alaska from the Middle West to settle the Matanuska Valley, the Red Cross sent a nurse, Madeleine de Foras, to remain with them for a year to help protect their health. Among the first friends she made were the little pioneer, Arthur Hack, 4 years old, and "Prince," the pup who went with his young master to Alaska.

Prepare Now For The Corn-Hog Check-Up

Signers of corn-hog contracts should prepare now for the final 1935 corn-hog compliance check-up, which will begin December 1, advices Tom Howard, chairman of the Marshall county corn-hog allotment committee.

Producers will be required to show sales and purchase slips for all feeder hogs bought and sold, and also sales slips for all hogs of their own farrowing which they have sold. Furthermore, evidence for home-farrowed hogs should be kept separate from the evidence for the purchased hogs. Producers having both purchased hogs and home-farrowed ones on their farms when the final count is made will be required to have the two penned separately or so marked that they can be easily identified.

Evidence for both purchased and home-farrowed hogs should cover the year December 1, 1934 to November 30, 1935.

Proper preparation made now for the inspection will save time and confusion later Mr. Howard says.

The Safety Man

Here are some suggestions for driving that should go a long way in preventing accidents:
1. When starting out, check the condition of tires, mirror, brakes horn, lights, windshield wiper. Make this a habit.
2. Have any mechanical trouble fixed. Don't drive with makeshift repairs.
3. Even if you have the right of way, give the other driver lots of room at intersections. He may need it!
4. Watch for signs and signals and do what they tell you to do!
5. Never pass another vehicle on a blind curve or approaching the crest of a hill and especially not at an intersection.
6. Do not let unauthorized persons ride with you.
7. Park properly, especially at night.
8. Between speed and safety every time.

Stratosphere Balloon Makes 74,000 Foot Sky Trip

What is recorded as the worlds highest flight in a ballon was made on Monday at Rapid City, South Dakota, by Captain Orville Anderson and Captain Albert W. Stevens. They went up into the stratosphere balloon Explore II, to a height of 74,000 feet or approximately fourteen miles above the earth.

The flight was sponsored by the National Geographic Society and the Army Air Corps. The balloon and fliers took off from the huge natural rock bowl in the Black Hills, seven miles south of Rapid City, at 8 a. m. on Monday and reached their pinnacle at 12:30. They stayed up in the air at this great height for half an hour to take pictures of cosmic rays and measure the various elements and cosmic rays

At 1:05 they started to come down and after manuevering around for about three hours they landed in a cornfield near White Lake, South Dakota, 240 miles from where they took off with the world's largest free balloon. They landed like a feather and none of the delicate instruments they were carrying for scientific purposes were harmed.

The temperatures at the height of the flight registered 72 below zero on the outside of the gondola and 19 above on the inside. The fliers were kept warm with fur-lined flying suits.

Both men reported that they could see the earth plainly at all times but that they could not tell what the objects were on it.

It was the greatest flight ever made by anyone and Mr. Anderson and Mr. Stevens have done a fine job of gathering scientific data for the people of our country.

SYNOPSIS

Following his father's criticism of his idle life, and withdrawal of financial assistance, Hal Ireland, son of a wealthy banker, is practically without funds but with the promise of a situation in San Francisco, which he must reach, from New York. He takes passage with a cross-country auto party on a "share expense" basis. Other members of the party include an attractive girl, Barry Trafford; middle-aged Giles Kerrigan; Sister Anastasia, a nun; and an individual whom he instinctively dislikes, Martin Crack. Barry's reticence annoys him. To Kerrigan he takes at once, but he distrusts Crack. He finds his intimacy with Kerrigan ripening, and makes a little progress with Barry. Through a misunderstanding, at a stopping place, Hal is directed to Barry's room, instead of his own, and they exchange kisses. Next day he tells her he loves her. She answers that she mustn't love him, without giving any reason. Crack brutally insults Kerrigan. Hal forces him to apologize abjectly, and his feeling of disgust toward Crack is intensified. On his insistence, Barry tells Hal that, at her father's urging, she had married a man many years older than she, and had promised her father, on his deathbed, to stick to her husband, "no matter what happened," for ten years. That was four years ago, and despite her knowledge of her husband's unworthiness, she is determined to keep her promise, though admitting her love for Hal. Next day an accident ruins the battery of the car, and the journey is halted for a time.

Then the last fence post fell apart across the low fire. Doc lay with his legs under him, sometimes raised his head from parallel forepaws to prick his ears intently into the gloom. And there was a less easy difference in the night.

"D'you s'pose that fella's building a battery?" Kerrigan murmured out of a silence; and he got to his feet in a stiff sort of aimlessness that ended in his lighting a cigarette and sitting down again.

"Hadn't honestly thought of the little—guy all night," said Hal.

He started to take his arm from Barry's waist—to shift his suddenly cramped position; but she stirred against him, murmured something, and he waited, watching for her calm again. Then he began a more careful maneuver; in the middle of it Barry made a quick, plaintive moan, turned as if to hold him, and her sleepy whisper said, "Darling, don't go, don't go, there's time." Her eyes opened. Disappointment chased the dream out of them as she looked from him to Kerrigan, and the high moon. Then she sat up straight, her rueful smile on the last of the fire.

"So we're still here," she said. "Were there ghosts?"

"None," said Hal. "Was that what you were dreaming?"

"I think so—toward the end. Dear Kerrigan, are there ghosts?"

"I would've said," said Kerrigan in a subdued tone, "that it took a ghost to sleep as you have and wake up without a shiny nose. You're not a ghost—thank the Lord, if you'll allow me—and neither is your nose shiny. So I don't know."

She gave him a slow smile of affection through her still disappointed drowsiness: "You've never seen a real ghost?" she said.

"I've thought I was just going to—oh, several times; but maybe I was trying too hard," said Kerrigan. "Usually about this time of night. In old countries midnight's supposed to be the time; but out here, I think before dawn—just when the east begins to gray."

There was a car coming from the direction of the highway—its loose noisiness advertised over a distance. They saw a pair of dim headlights stare up and drop down again over a rise.

"Splash with our battery," said Kerrigan, subdued.

"If that's a bet I won't take it," said Hal moodily, and he looked down at Barry. She was staring into the embers, miles off in some somber thought.

The car lurched up over the rock outcrop and came to a chattering stop beside Rasputin, the motor racing under loud rattles and drummings in the old body. Neither Barry nor Kerrigan moved; Hal got up, stiff and reluctant, and went around, saying without welcome, "That you?"

"Yeah," said Crack lazily, somehow as if he had been gone a matter only of moments.

And in that dismal pre-dawn hour, with a low stain of gray across the east and the sharp, mocking flash of the air-beacon in the gloom below it, Hal was heavily oppressed by the sense of ill impending.

Monday

They were in Evanston, on the edge of Wyoming, at sunrise, with the fresh, concentrated red and blue of the restaurant's neon tubes saluting the good blue and red-gold of the crescent morning. The restaurant was in full blast, giving breakfast to two loads of eastbound bus travelers off to an early start. And Rasputin had hardly stopped before the Pulsiphers were bustling toward the door, drawing the others in their wake. Hal caught Barry's wrist as she was passing and kept her back.

She didn't try to move away. Hal said: "It's odd how sad—almost foreboding—enchantment can be when it's going—off, away. My promise is over too—and I love you."

Barry still looked out from the abrupt edge of the town as she said, "The enchantment'll never be over."

"Barry," said Hal, "think of this for me today—before tonight. I must know where I can find your husband. I will know it if I have to follow you like a dog—everywhere you go for years; and I will see him. It'll be so much easier if you tell me. Tonight I shall come to ask you."

Dully she said: "I'll never tell you. Don't you see I have to use every cowardly thing I can think of to keep my bargain—a bargain not to anyone living, not to anyone you or I can talk to or bribe or bully, but to some one who is dead—my father? Don't you see that?"

"I don't see it," said Hal, quietly secure. "Your father deceived you, cheated you. This man he gave you to is not to be considered, except as an animal in the way. If your father is anywhere now, he knows he cheated you, and he's paying for it until you release him. If he's—not anywhere, it doesn't matter. It's between us—no one else."

She tugged at her held arm once, not to get it from him but to make a gesture of hopelessness. "It isn't that way: I know it isn't that way, Hal, and I have to live with myself. I—"

"You don't," Hal interrupted in low-voiced authority. "You have to live with me."

She looked off into the east, with dark, sullen things trying to soil the blue bravery of her eyes. Then she turned calmly to him and said in husky listlessness: "I'll live with you, after we get to Los Angeles. For a week, I'll go with you somewhere and live with you."

He watched her level, heavy-lidded look of reproach without speaking, waiting for her to show him a trace of warmth behind it, waiting for her to see in his eyes the strength she would have later to meet and fall before. "Not good enough, Barry," he said. "D'you think that after a week I'd let you go—any sooner than I will now?"

"You might," she said dully; and by a quick turn of her head she evaded the issue his unsmiling eyes forced upon her. "Let's go to breakfast."

* * * * * * *

As they ran out of Wyoming in the dry, growing heat, Hal became more uncomfortably aware of the division in him, as if there were two people behind the jiggling wooden wheel. One was grown illogically grim in self-persuasion of power, able to wipe off sticking webs of weariness and premonition, but unable to turn where they didn't touch and stick again. The other was a light, unintimate shell of personality, with a saving nimbleness that effected talk and laughter with Kerrigan, quick mourning for a murdered porcupine at the roadside, recurrent pleasure in the twitching alertness, the busy running, of the fat-bellied gophers.

They were in Salt Lake City near nine o'clock, and Mrs. Pulsipher said it would be a wicked waste not to be able to say they'd seen the Temple while they were here. The avenue up which they turned had clear water running lavishly in both gutters; and tall trees on either side.

"That's the Temple," Mrs. Pulsipher said in sudden energy. "That's the Temple, Mr. Kerrigan."

They passed the stiff, gray facade with its tiers of arches. Hal thought vividly of Crack, there behind him, looking straight down the street that would take them between the files of tall trees, pleased in his private waiting, as if the trees were an omen for him. After lunch, if Barry wouldn't sit in front with him, Hal would have Crack there—where he could look at him, see his expression, talk to him, and finish the narrow little guy's alien linkage with that undetermined sense of ill.

They stopped for lunch in Fillmore, halfway down the length of Utah, and on Kerrigan's map the three hundred-odd remaining miles to Las Vegas looked long and savorless to Hal—to be covered before night and his final, imperious siege of Barry.

Crack, beside him, looked up from his own scrutiny of the map and, with a shy smile at Mrs. Pulsipher, said: "Las Vegas' too far. We had plenty of ridin' today already."

The insinuation, somehow, of placing himself in assured opposition nettled Hal like open insolence, and he dismissed all thought of the tedium in pushing on. "You don't have to drive," he said casually. "All you have to do is sit. If any of the ladies are tired, we'll stop as soon as they want to."

Mrs. Pulsipher asked how far Las Vegas was, and when Crack told her, she looked grimly familiar with impositions and supposed that if anybody was in a great hurry, the others would have to keep on, too.

"Who-who-who's in a hurry?" John asked her out of sudden perplexity.

"Don't ask me," said Mrs. Pulsipher.

"I am," said Hal quietly.

Sister Anastasia, her faintly worried eyes smiling a little at Hal, said: "Because I asked, Mr. Ireland told me we would be in Los Angeles tomorrow. Per'aps he believes I must be there then. It is not necessary. It would be better to stop this afternoon and rest. We are all tired—Mr. Ireland especially, I think."

Hal denied it, but the nun's gentle diffidence persuaded Mrs. Pulsipher he was showing a nobility which he certainly hadn't room to feel. Then Kerrigan pointed out that if they stopped the night at Saint George, at the bottom of Utah, there was little more than four hundred miles left to Los Angeles and they'd be there tomorrow anyway. Hal glanced at Barry, saw her remote in her own disturbing thoughtfulness, and gave in. Even as he spared a silent "D—n your little meddling" for Crack's gratified quiet beside him, he knew he could not come too quickly to the dispersal of those clouds in the precious bravery of Barry's eyes.

The prospect of the short afternoon lifted a gaiety in the car again; and the presentiments of coming ill withdrew a little to wait for Hal just beyond the fringes of sense. Barry was in the front seat where he could make sure of her clear, living reality whenever the need touched him. And, with Kerrigan cheerfully joining them from behind, they welcomed together the impersonal things of the route.

They talked about the good names, and what the dickens you could do with them besides taste them in your mouth and your fancy: Spanish Fork, on the road behind; and from Kerrigan's map, Hurricane and Enterprise, Gunlock and Solitude, Searchlight, Orderville, and Antimony.

From the back seat John Pulsipher wistfully ventured, "That's kinda beautiful out there"; and Mrs. Pulsipher said, not quite so severely as she might have, "If they think it's pretty, they can see it is without you telling 'em."

"No harm sayin' it," said John gently.

"No harm keepin' quiet, either," said his wife.

"Why don't you then?" said John, with the quick air of throwing a snowball and the h—l with the consequences.

Before Mrs. Pulsipher could summon a retort, the nun's soft, reverent voice said, "It is very beautiful."

Hal made her say the words over again in his head, not to find out how their simplicity gave him valor, but to feel the warm stimulant of that simple gift, to fix in his heart new and certain strength. In his importunate assault upon Barry's captivity he would have Sister Anastasia's blessing. He had been a fool to let that foreboding hour before dawn dog his infallibility so far through the bright day. He was master of himself; he was somehow master of beauty, of events, of spaces even wider, clearer, more superbly colored than the incredible nobilities that stood there defying the sun. He could blend the savage temper of such a red, ancient cliff with the pure, devout acquiescence of Anastasia's heart, and make will an instrument to discipline his stars.

* * * * * * *

Hal, in helping the clerk up with the luggage, made sure that Barry had a room to herself. And after supper, calm in his assurance of strength, he didn't bother her going upstairs with Sister Anastasia. Later he would find her, when the others were in bed and the little hotel was quiet.

Through the plate-glass window—a proscenium upon the street for the rank of oak-and-leather rocking chairs in the lobby—Kerrigan saw a "star" of the screen, in a highly becoming absent-mindedness about clothes, advertised outside the movie opposite.

"I could learn to love that little girl," said Kerrigan, a sparkle of pleasure in his eyes. "Go?"

The friendly shirt-sleeved man behind the ticket window advised them to turn south inside the door, because the south aisle was cooler. So they turned "south," in a room not larger than Frederick Ireland's downtown office; but it wasn't appreciably cooler and a slide blandly informed them that the "star" was coming next week. So after half an hour of gangster routine, they went to stroll in the gathered evening.

The wide, treeless main street of Saint George still breathed heat; but Hal pleasurably, almost proprietarily recognized in it the relaxed grace that American villages wear well, after dusk.

"Ever drink?" said Kerrigan. "No—I know you don't want one; I can always tell when a man's going to explain that he doesn't feel like a drink, and it always makes me a little sad."

"It's so d—n hot," said Hal apologetically. "And besides—"

"Ah, yes, besides," Kerrigan murmured. "What time's your audience?"

"In a little while," said Hal.

Saying that, and still sure of the sharp invincibility that armed him, he yet felt the hollow, nervous emptiness under his chest, the live, almost chill suspense of the middle that comes in the imminence of great possibilities. He drew breath, and it didn't fill the emptiness. He looked at his watch and stopped, saying, "Now, I guess, Colonel. Pray for me a little, or drink at me, or something, will you?"

"I will, sir," said Kerrigan gravely. "If you should want company later, my door'll be open and I sleep light. Night, sport—and luck." It was as if he also said, I wish to God I could help you. And Hal was somehow oddly reluctant to leave him.

There was only one light in the lobby, and the clerk was locking a drawer at the desk. He looked up and said, "Your name Ireland?"

"Yes," said Hal, over quick, repressed apprehension.

"Message for you," said the clerk, and handed him an envelope.

He thought he would have guessed it was Barry's hand in any case—the characters frank, large, and fearlessly curved. "Hal," he read: "There's no good in it, truly. Everything you say will only hurt; and if it hurts more, I shall die. Leave me alone, dear darling, for both our sakes. Except tomorrow, in daylight—before it all has to end. Barry."

The Man Who Knows

Whether the Remedy You are taking for Headaches, Neuralgia or Rheumatism Pains is SAFE is Your Doctor. Ask Him

Don't Entrust Your Own or Your Family's Well-Being to Unknown Preparations

BEFORE you take any preparation you don't know all about, for the relief of headaches; or the pains of rheumatism, neuritis or neuralgia, ask your doctor what he thinks about it—in comparison with Genuine Bayer Aspirin.

We say this because, before the discovery of Bayer Aspirin, most so-called "pain" remedies were advised against by physicians as being bad for the stomach; or, often, for the heart. And the discovery of Bayer Aspirin largely changed medical practice.

Countless thousands of people who have taken Bayer Aspirin year in and out without ill effect, have proved that the medical findings about its safety were correct.

Remember this: Genuine Bayer Aspirin is rated among the fastest methods yet discovered for the relief of headaches and all common pains . . . and safe for the average person to take regularly.

You can get real Bayer Aspirin at any drug store—simply by never asking for it by the name "aspirin" alone, but always saying BAYER ASPIRIN when you buy.

A liquid laxative is the answer, mothers. The answer to all your worries over constipation. A liquid can be measured. The dose can be exactly suited to any age or need. Just reduce the dose each time, until the bowels are moving of their own accord and need no help.

This treatment will succeed with any child and with any adult.

Doctors use liquid laxatives. Hospitals use the liquid form. If it is best for their use, it is best for home use. And today, there are fully a million families that will have no other kind in the house.

The liquid laxative generally used is Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. It is a doctor's prescription, now so widely known that you can get it all ready for use at any drugstore.

Fake Fingerprints May Divert Police Suspicion

Fingerprints of different people, as we know, are never the same. But it is possible for a crook to imitate a genuine fingerprint so that the suspicion of the police can be diverted, says Pearson's Weekly.

How this can be done has been shown by Dr. Harold Cummins of the Tulane University of Medicine, Chicago. Taking an original genuine fingerprint, he had it engraved, and made a three dimensional negative in wax. Then he took a cast in gelatin on a dummy finger. Twelve of the 32 prints he made with the dummy finger were declared by fingerprint experts to be genuine.

Though this proportion is not very great, the United States authorities believe it is sufficient to allow criminals many opportunities to put the police on false trails.

Washington Digest

National Topics Interpreted by William Bruckart

National Press Building Washington, D. C.

Washington.—In days not so far in the distant past, an argument could be developed in any community where there were more than a handful of Democrats if one took the position that the rights of the federal government were predominant over states' rights. States' rights constituted an issue that never died politically until the New Deal arrived on the scene at Washington. Through some two years or more now, we had heard very little about states' rights. Yet, within the last few days, we have found that the states' rights issue was not dead. It was only sleeping, and it has come to life in a really big way.

States' Rights

New Deal policies have been consistently policies of centralization of power in the hands of the federal government. New Dealers have enacted much legislation and have carried out many programs that appear to be contrary to the views which used to be held by advocates of states' rights. These things have been accomplished with almost no complaint from the Democratic side and with only a minimum of squawking from New Deal opposition from whence came complaints about regimentation and extension of government functions into the field of private enterprise in competition with the government's citizens.

Lately, however, some thirty or thirty-five cities have awakened with a shock and have rendered one New Deal program a severe jolt by that awakening. I refer to the plans for government construction of the so-called low cost housing projects. These were and are intended to provide apartments or small homes for families in the very low income brackets and to provide work for labor in their construction. Eventually, it was hoped, the program would use up a good many hundred million dollars of work-relief funds. Some has already been spent; some projects have been completed, and these results coincided with the arrival of tax paying time in certain localities. That was the crux.

* * *

To show what has happened in those cities and areas wherein the low cost housing projects have been planned or completed, let us take a particular case, namely, the housing project in Atlanta, Georgia. It is of no use to cite the facts in all of them, because the Atlanta case is typical.

Atlanta Project

Secretary Ickes and his Public Works administration had spent approximately three million dollars in the construction of the Atlanta housing layout. No sooner had this been accomplished, however, than the city of Atlanta awakened to the fact that it would get no taxes nor will the state of Georgia get taxes from this great investment. The project was ruled by Comptroller General J. R. McCarl to be federally owned. As such, it was not subject to state or municipal taxation. The city of Atlanta and the state of Georgia had been deriving taxes from the real estate now owned by Uncle Sam.

It was Atlanta's turn to move. It announced through its properly constituted city authorities that if there were no taxes, then Atlanta could not furnish fire and police protection for the property nor could it supply water for the tenants nor would it permit children of those tenants to attend the Atlanta schools as free students. Atlanta contended that it bears the burden of these expenses and it was not going to add to that burden without reimbursement.
